Should a Minister Use Tobacco?

Mr. Editor: I do not hesitate to take the negative of this proposition, although many ministers, who are abler and better than I ever hope to be, use the weed. When I was a boy I formed the habit of chewing, thinking it looked manly, but I soon became disgusted with it, that is, with the looks of it, and quit. After entering the ministry, I got to smoking a little but soon abandoned that, for various reasons. It seemed to me to be a needless expense, and a bad example; besides, I depricated the loss of my liberty, in so far as to become a slave to a habit that was of questionable propriety. Since then I have been strengthened and confirmed in my anti-tobacco principles. I have often put the matter in this way, to members of my charge, who use tobacco: "I do not say the moderate use of tobacco is sinful, but I do say you ought to give more money to the Lord, than you consume upon your lust; else you will be counted a lover of pleasures, more than a lover of God." But I do not think I ever made much impression by my argument. Is it because a bad habit blunts our moral sensibilities? or is it because the force of the truth is neutralized by the example of so many able, and holy ministers of the Gospel? I do not undertake to say; perhaps neither.

Once upon a time it devolved on me to provide for Conference. Said a brother to me, "Give me a room mate, if convenient, who does not smoke, as it makes me very sick to be in a room where gentlemen are smoking." I promised to do so, and presently selected an aged member of Conference, whom I knew to be an anti-tobacco man, for his companion. This was some months before Conference convened. In passing around among my parishioners, to arrange for the entertainment of the brethern, one gentlemen, who had an elegant home and a charming family, and who agreed to take two: said to me "If perfectly convenient, give me two men who do not use Tobacco." I gave him my two anti-tobacco friends; and though in completing arrangements changes were made in the assignments, to adjust things to the best advantage, yet these two brethern were never seperated, or changed. There was another man who asked for two men, who would take a glass of brandy with him. We could not accomodate him.

A gentleman said to me: "Mr. ——— is quite popular with his people, but there is a lady on his circuit, who is trying very hard to prevent her sons from using tobacco; and she says when her pastor comes, his example (for he smokes more than neutralizes her influence and conneil with her boys. She likes him very much, and greatly desires his influence with her sons in every other respect, for they are just developing into manhood, and he has a fine influence over them; but she is so anxious for her boys not to smoke, that she almost wishes her young pastor would not come any more."

The above may not be exactly accurate, but it is substantially correct. And what an argument does it carry! for that Christian lady is not alone in her views, and wishes, in regard to the habits of her sons.

To all young preachers, I do not presume to suggest to old ones) I commend the advice of Paul, to Timothy; "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit in faith, in purity." 1st Timothy iv. 15.

Begging pardon for the length of this article I subscribe myself.

JONATHAN.

Letter of Bishop Janes to His Buried Daughter.

"When it was your turn for a letter from father before, for reasons I need not name, I did not address you. But as your turn has come again I feel unwilling to pass you. This will not be the first letter I ever wrote you which I did not expect you would read. I wrote you many in your early childhood that dear mother had to read to you. I have also written you many I did not expect you would answer, not only in your childhood, but during your long illness. It was a happiness to me to write you. I cannot expect you will answer this letter with pen and ink. That beautiful hand—it will not make you vain to say there never was a more beautiful one— will never write 'dear papa' again. I am not certain but that you may see this letter, and as an evidence of loving remembrance it may give you a pleasurable emotion. At any rate I like to continue this habit of love, of writing to you. Have you not been cognizant of all my doings since you left me? Have you not witnessed my travels and services? Perhaps so, and consequently I can give you no information concerning myself. Though you may be acquainted with our outward circumstances, I doubt whether you can read our hearts. You may know from the tear on the cheek that we are unhappy, or from the smile on our lips that we are rejoicing, but the cause an i character of our experience probably you may not discern. I do not think you know how lonely and sad we felt after you left us. While we had your precious body with us our loss was but partial. But when in the most delicate, honored, and religious manner possible we had laid that out of our sight, and realized that its eyes would no longer beam on us, its lips no more address us, or face no more smile on us until the resurrection morning, we felt very desolate. There was a great vacancy in our sweet home, an irrepressible desire for the loved presence an anxious looking for her appearence; and then the painful recollection she will never come—O! it was a wonderful experience! With me it still remains—I think will ever continue until you hail me partaker of your glory. Even if I know you would read this statement I should not fear it would pain you. I believe all painful experience with you is past. But if you were susceptible of sorrowful emotions, I do not think this knowledge would make you unhappy. In the light that now shines upon you, you understand the reason for this providence. You will see how it works for our good. God's ways are all plain and pleasing to you. 'Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth,' is the song of your heart. And if your know our sorrows, you also know our joys. You know how God comforts us.

"You also know how frequent our recollections of you are; how sweet and strong our assurance is that Jesus will watch your sleeping dust, and bid it rise again like unto His glorious body. You know how we have delighted to think of you as enjoying the beatitudes of the heavenly estate. I have allowed myself to imagine how things occurred with you and how they seemed to you as you entered the realm of glory. I have thought it not improbable that the spirit of him who enabled you by faith to "behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world," had some agency in bringing you to the open vision of the glorious Saviour. I am certain that vision was not withheld from you. To see Christ as he is, O! who could turn away from that entertaining sight even to look after loved and loving friends upon earth? Still I believe such are the powers of the glorified spirits that somehow or other, while they enjoy heaven, they are familiar with earth. I can never cease to love Tillie—I do not believe she will ever cease to love me. Because I love you I rejoice in your happiness.

"Tillie, I know where you are; you are not lost. I know what you are. This knowledge of your welfare, how it comforts me! I am willing you should be there. I would not call you away. I had rather pass through what remains to me of life without the cheer of your presence than interrupt your enjoyment of your Saviour, or divert you from his praise. I suppose you have seen angels and seraphs—and the spirits of the just made perfect. How glad aunty was to welcome you! Have you not seen grandpa and grandmamma? You did not know them in this world. I judge they have found you and rejoiced with you ere this. Have you ever thought, 'I wish father and mother and brother and sisters knew how happy I am?' Well, we do know all we can comprehend—thank God for the Holy Bible! Let me assure you we are coming to see you; we shall let our heavenly Father set the time, but we are all coming. The time may seem long to us, but it will not seem long to you. We are all coming—we are even going to bring little Guy with us.

"Till we meet thus, I remain your loving father."—From the "Life of Bishop Janes."

The Mother-in-Law.

FAITH RIPLEY.

It is somewhat peculiar that the much reviled mother-in-law, before the marriage of her daughter commands the (wordy) homage of the world of men, who never weary of chanting her praises. To a man they land her self-denial, her sympathetic nature, her tact; many and contrasting are the poems in honor of the mother. Mankind claims, yes, insists, that motherhood is the crowning glory of womanhood. Whatever woman may achieve, be she an Eliot, a Caroline Herchel, an Emily Blackwell, a Rosa Bonheur, or a Nightingale; though she speaks and writes with the tongue of an angel, but has not children, her life is a failure compared with that of even the least of mothers. The ignorant immigrant (so, in effect, say men), with never an aspiration above the petty cares and ignoble aims of her toilsome daily life; whose little ones, ill-favored and dirty, swarm through dark allies, and noisome rookeries, is to be honored above the single woman, whatever the latter's position or attainments. To motherhood—in the abstract—man has elected to bow the knee, and in print, on platform, and from pulpit, extravagant praises are lavishly bestowed on the mothers. It may be remarked incidentally that all this enthusiasm does not, however, prevent mothers from being classed with criminals and idiots on all questions save those pertaining to the kitchen and the nursery. As a mother, woman is reverenced (in speech); as a mother-in-law, she is reviled. To the mother is ascribed every good and gracious quality of womanliness; but it only requires so simple an act as the marriage of a daughter to transform this "saintly being" into a creature fit only for gibes and sneers. The mother-in-law occupies the anomalous position of being at one and the same time the representative of what is pure and holy, and also the embodiment of all that is most ignoble. This sudden development of sinister qualities is the more remarkable as—if the records of men are trustworthy—in attaining a son-in-law, a mothers highest ambition is gratified. Perhaps the mother is so over-zealous in serving her daughter as to be betrayed into giving councels which might better have been left unspoken. There may be, however, much to excuse her zeal. It is well to remember that every creature, wholly dependent on man's mercy, has had eventually to protect itself against him. The more helpless and dependent the class, the more brutal and tyrannous has been man's attitude toward it. After ages of bardship and torture, poor dumb beasts found champions, and man is now coerced into ——— just, if not merciful to brutes. And to the everlasting shame of humanity, it has been found necessary to establish associations for the protection of children against their parents. There is as yet no association for the protection of wives; if there were, perhaps less would be heard of the interference of mothers-in-law. Hundreds of wives are "protected" to unhappiness, to chronic invalidism, to premature old age, and to death, by the unwisdom and the selfishness of their husbands. Is it reasonable to expect the mother, who has never counted any sacrifice of self too costly, which promised to insure comfort or happiness for her child, to remain a passive spectator of the cruelty or indifference of that child's "protector?" It is noticeable that it is only the wife's mother who is satirized, which only goes to prove that men recognize here as an influence likely to seriously and unpleasantly affect the selfishness of their "protection" policy. The solution of the mother-in-law question lies in training men to as keen an appreciation of the duties of husbands as they now have of the rights and privileges of that estate.—Art Interchange.

A teacher defined conscience as "something within you that tells you when you have done wrong." "I had it once," spoke up a young low-head of six summers, "but they had to send for the doctor."

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

WHILE THERE'S LIFE THERE'S HOPE.

There is no condition so low as to be hopeless, nor any plane so high as to be without fear. Many use Brown's Iron Bitters in health as well as in sickness. It is natures best assistant in keeping health and in restoring health. Its use will make you and all your family healthy, robust and strong, and save much loss of time and heavy doctor bills.

—Hon. J. Baldwin, founder of Baldwin University, of Berea, Ohio, has given $3,000 to establish a school at Bangalore, India, in Rev. William Taylor's work.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—A special from Asheville, N. C., says: On Monday a section of Bald Mountain, half a mile square, slid off into the valley with a crash that shook the earth and frightened the inhabitants for miles around. The terror was as great, but not so long continued, as four years ago when it was expected that Bald Mountain would become a volcano. No explanations is offered, but many speculations are made. The people are afraid to venture upon a close examination.

CHARLESTON, Feb. 15.—Bishop Wm. May Wightman, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, died at his residence in this city this morning, after an illness of over eighteen months, aged 76 years.

He was licensed to preach in 1827, and was successively professor in Randolph and Macon College, Virginia; editor of the Southern Christian Advocate and President of Wofford College, South Carolina, and Chancellor of the Southern University, at Greensboro, Ala. He was elected Bishop in 1866, was a fine scholar, a pulpit orator of rare power, and universally popular.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16.—After an explanation by Mr. Edmunds that a short executive at this time would be more desirable than at the close of the session, in view of an arrangement for the final disposition of the polygamy bill to-day, the Senate at 12:40 went into executive session and at 1:15 resumed legistative business, when the regular order, the anti polygamy bill, was proceeded with, the question being upon the eighth section as reported from the Judiciary Committee. The section vacates all the register and election offices of the Territory and devolves their duties, until provisions therefor is made by the legislative assembly to be created as provided by the bill, on a board of five persons, to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, all of whom shall not be members of one political party. It further directs that the canvas and return of votes at elections for members of the legislative assembly shall be made to this board which is to canvas such returns and issue certificates of election to those persons who, being eligible for election, shall appear to have been lawfully elected, and that the assembly, after its organization, shall have power to decide upon the election and qualification of its members, and to fill the offices made vacant by the bill. The preceding (or 7th) section disfranchises and makes ineligible to office in any Territory, or other places under exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, any polygamist, bigamist, or person cohabiting with more than one woman.

An interesting debate followed, in the course of which Messrs. Brown and Morgan, among others, spoke against the returning board features of the bill, which gave the Commissioners power to disfranchise all polygamists, which term they might construe to cover all Mormons, inasmuch as polygamy is a tenet of the Mormon faith.

The remaining committe amendments and several sections of the bill were then agreed to without further debate, and the bill reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Brown then renewed his amendment requiring that not more than three of the members of the Board of Commissioners shall be members of the same political party. Agreed to on a party vote. Ayes 26, nays 24. Mr. Davis, of Illinois, voted aye with the Democrats, and Mahone was absent.

Another amendment, offered by Mr. Brown, to the last section of the bill, was adopted, prohibiting the board from disfranchising any one on account of his opinion on the subject of bigamy or polygamy. Several amendments were proposed and defeated by decisive votes, and after the rearrangement of its sections, the bill finally passed by a viva voce vote, in which no negative responses were heard.

HOUSE.

Mr. Cox, of New York, from the committee to audit the expenses growing out of the death and burial of the late President, James A. Garfield, reported a bill granting a pension of $5000 a year to Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield.

Mr. Atkins, of Tennessee, said he would not object to the bill, but he thought that a similar measure should be adopted to pension the widow of any other President. The bill was passed.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 16.—The condition of Senator Ben Hill, of Georgia, who returned to Jefferson Medical College Hospital for treatment nearly a fortnight ago, is reported as greatly improved to-day. An operation upon the gland of the neck was performed by Prof. Gross several days ago, and since then the patient has gained in strength, and is able to take sufficient nourishment. His case is looked upon as hopeful, the attending physicians declaring their belief that all trace of cancerous affection has been removed.

GALVESTON, Feb. 17.—A special to the News from Corsicana, says: Claims against the county because of expenses incurred in treatment of small-pox patients develops the fact that there have been 141 cases and 25 deaths, confined exclusively to negroes.

RICHMOND, Va., Feb. 18.—Mrs. D. S. Doggett, widow of the late Bishop D. S. Doggett, of the Methodist Church, South, died here to-day, aged sixty-nine years.

JACKSONVILLE, Feb. 18.—Sam. W. Small, ("Old Si"), formerly of the Atlanta Constitution, has acquired a half interest in the Union of this city, and will, after the first proximo, be permanently connected with that journal. The Florida Methodist, a new religious paper published here, made its first appearance to-day.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—A fire started in the business portion of the town of Haverhill, Mass., last night and spread with great rapidity. The small fire department was unable to cope with the flames, which soon got beyond control. Assistance was telegraphed for to Lawrence, Newberryport and other towns adjacent.

At 3:55 A. M. the fire was got under control; but one block remains on Wingate street and two at the upper end of Washington street; all else in the square bounded by the Merrimac river on the south, Washington Square and Essex street on the east, the north side of Wingate street on the north and the railroad square on the west, is burned to the ground.

This territory embraces the largest part of the boot and shoe manufactores. The loss can not be estimated at present. What yesterday was the finest street in the city and the principle business mart, is to-day a smouldering, shapeless mass of ruins. Some 80 shoe firms are entirely burned out, and others suffer more or less damage.

Men who were last night worth thousands are this morning penniless, while the losses of others are fully or partially covered by insurance. Two thousand people are out of employment, and several families homeless. The loss is estimated at $2,000,000.

The loss will be fully up to the first estimate, and will be most severely felt by manufacturers with small capital, who had their all invested, and in many cases were but partially insured. Many firms have already located in new quarters, and will resume business on Monday. The employees of many of the firms were paid off as usual this afternoon.

The banks which were burned have procured funds for the use of their depositors. Several of their safes were opened this afternoon and the contents were found to be but little injured. The vaults of the banks will be reached by Monday.

HAZELHURST, Feb. 19.—A very destructive fire occurred here last night. It broke out in the retail saloon owned by John Popovich, between 1 and 2 o'clock, and swept rapidly up Estell street, destroying everything in its passage. The losers are: Moses Marx, livery stable and feed ware-house, $3,000, no insurance; John Popovich, stock, $1,000, insurance not known; George Tomlelck, stock, $1,000 house owned by Chaffe & Powell, $1,500, insurance on same $600; T. Adolph Baker, stock $500, no insurance; house owned by Faler & Co., $1,000, no insurance; P. Klotz, stock $1,000, no insurance; E. Sabul, house and stock $2 500, insurance $2,000; Rev. Mr. Linfield's residence, $1,500, insurance, $1,000; J. F. Vance, house occupied by Mrs. Mooro, $500. The origin of the fire is unknown. Suspicious circumstances point somewhere. Three whisky saloons went up. The total loss is estimated at about $15,000; insurance, $40,000.

MEMPHIS, Feb. 19.—A special from Helena says: There is no abatement of the disasters that have overtaken the planters of the Mississippi valley, caused by the overflow of the Mississippi river between Memphis and Vicksburg. For three weeks they have been battling, not only with the elements from above, (as it has rained almost daily during this period,) but inch by inch the mighty river has been encroaching upon them, until now there is but a dreary watery waste extending fully fifteen miles inland from either bank. The destruction to dwellings, stock and lands can not now be precisely estimated.

PINE BLUFF, Ark., Feb. 19.—Arkansas City is inundated. Trains on the Little Rock and Mississippi River Road have discontinued trips there on account of high water.

SHREVEPORT, Feb. 20.—A heavy wind and rain storm passed over this city to-day. Much damage was suffered; trees and fences were carried away. Reports from all directions are that rivers, bayous and lakes are rising rapidly. The river here is much higher than it has been for years.

MEMPHIS, February 20.—A Helena (Ark.) special says: The situation remains unchanged. The river has been on a stand for the past 24 hours. The water continues rising in the city, and is now over North Main street at the Presbyterian Church. All mills and workshops in the lower part of the city have suspended operations, and many laborers were thrown out of employment.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, Feb. 14.—A dispatch from Cairo to the Daily News, says: The situation continues to be one of expectancy. It is feared that the present Ministers will be forced to take decided action in order to hold their own with the army. There are distinct symptoms of impatience among the soldiery, of which the Chamber is merely the mouthpiece.

TAUREEZ, Feb. 14.—An epidemic, strongly resembling the plague, recently appeared near Saujbulagh. Forty deaths have occurred since February 8.

LONDON, Feb. 14.—A Vienna dispatch to the Standard, says: The Shah of Persia has granted to a French company concession for the construction of a railway from Teheran to Reshet. The company is to pay 5,500,000 francs on the opening of the line, besides a rent of 55,000 francs yearly for the period of the concession.

VIENNA, Feb. 14.—A dispatch from Alexandria, Egypt, to the Freidenblatt says: A detachment of Yemen rebels is advancing upon Mecca, via Saaich, to proclaim there the spiritual deposition of the Sultan of Turkey and the restoration of the Arabian caliphate.

LONDON, Feb. 16.—The Times says that it understands that the reports of the British Consuls in regard to outrages against the Jews in Russia are about to be issued by the Foreign Office. They do not show that any cases of visitation of women have been clearly proved. The evidence is clear regarding other serious outrages.

The dispatch relative to anti Jewish outrages in Russia states that had the authorities used the necessary force the outrages might have been confined to a very narrow circle. The Jews still remaining in Russia are reluctant to give full information in regard to them.

F. D. Mocatta has contributed £1000 to the Jewish relief fund, and offers to contribute 1 per cent. of any sum, not exceeding £2,000,000, collected within two years.

At a meeting of the Mansion House Committee of the Jewish Relief Fund, letters from Gladstone and Earl Granville were read, acknowledging receipt of resolutions adopted at the meeting held at the Mansion House on the first instant to protest against outrages perpetrated on the Jews in Russia.

CAIRO, Feb. 16.—The Ministers have decided in principle upon the total abolition of slavery. In view of the execution of this decision Kader Pasha has been appointed Governor of Sondan, and a special department for the province will be created at Cairo. Detailed instructions relative to the slave trade and slavery are now being prepared.

ROME, Feb. 16.—The Pope has addressed a very grave letter to the Italian Bishops, commending them, in view of the dangers surrounding the church, to increase their activity and courage Catholic societies and the laity to develop a Catholic press to advocate boldly the temporal independence of the Pope.

EATING BEFORE SLEEPING.—Man is the only animal that can be taught to sleep quietly on an empty stomach. The brute creation resent all efforts to coax them to such a violation of the laws of nature. The lion roars in the forest until he has found his prey, and when he has devoured it he sleeps over until he needs another meal. The horse will paw all night in the stable and the pig will squeal in the pen, refusing all rest of sleep until they are fed. The animals which chew the cud have their own provision for a late meal just before dropping off to their nightly slumbers.

Man can train himself to the habit of sleeping without a preceding meal, but only after long years of practice. As he comes into the world nature is too strong for him, and he must be fed before he will sleep. A child's stomach is small, and when perfectly filled, if no sickness disturbs it, sleep follows naturally and inevitably. As digestion goes on the stomach begins to empty. A single fold in it makes the little sleeper restless; two will wake it; and if it is hushed again into repose the nap is short. Paregoric or other narcotic may close its eyes again, but without either food or some stupefying drug it will not sleep, no matter how healthy it may be. Not even an angel who learned the art of ministrelsy in a celestial choir can sing a babe to sleep upon an empty stomach. We use the oft quoted illustration, "sleeping as sweetly as an infant," because this slumber of a child follows immediately after its stomach is completely filled with wholesome food. The sleep which comes to adults long after partaking of food, and when the stomach is nearly or quite empty, is not after the type of infantile repose. There is all the difference in the world between the sleep of refreshment and the sleep of exhaustion.

To sleep well the blood that swells the veins in the head during our busy hours must flow back, leaving a greatly diminished volume behind the brow that lately throbbed with such vehemence. To digest well, this blood is needed at the stomach and nearer the fountains of life. It is a fact established beyond the possibility of contradiction that sleep aids this digestion, and that process of digestion is conducive of refreshing sleep. It needs no argument to convince us of this mental relation. The drowsiness which always follows the well ordered meal is itself a testimony of nature to this inter-dependence.—New York Journal of Commerce.

GROWTH OF THE TRAFFIC IN FROGS. In spite of the prejudice existing against the frog, frog-eating has now established itself firmly as an American institution. For a time it was confined to the Eastern states, but soon the hardy Westerner succumbed to the custom of effete Europe, and Chicago and San Francisco are as deeply in the mire as Boston and New York. At Elgin, Ill., there is a man who found it so profitable that he went into the business a few years since of raising a peculiar kind of frog for the Western markets. While here in many cases they are sold under fictitious names, it is said that in the West they are served up as fried frogs. A considerable improvement has taken place in this trade recently, and a dealer says there is a good demand for all that can be secured. Many restaurants and most of the hotels have the deficiency, though not on the regular bill of fare, only serving to order. A large part of the frogs sold here are native, but there is a curious competition on the part of the Canadian article. In Canada the business is conducted on a large scale, and the industry, which lately received considerable encouragement by the increased demand, is at present very promising. Numbers of boys who have become quite expert, spear the frogs in the country ponds and streams and sell them in the city to the commission dealers, from whom they receive five to ten cents a dozen. The commission men skin, pack in ice, and ship them to the Northern and Western cities, where the delicious tidbits bring them a handsome profit. In this city the frogs are sold generally by the dozen, and bring from twenty to fifty cents, according to quality. As the demand increases the business will furnish quite a source of rural income, and thrifty Cape Codders might consider this suggestion, as from personal observation it is known that vast numbers of frogs are there which now live to a respected, serene and honored old age. The subject of canning frogs is now being talked of, and efforts are being made to discover a good process for this purpose.—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

MISSION WORK IN SPAIN.—The Congregationalists are contemplating the establishment of two schools of a high grade in Spain. One is for the training of young women, the other for educating young men to become evangelists.

Says a cute observer: "The man who stops his paper to economize is like a man who goes barefoot to save his shoes."

Mr. D. Brothers, of Portsmouth, O., writes: "Two years ago I suffered from severe attack of Malarial fever; I was brought very low to death's door; I had never fully recovered, and often was distressed with biliousness' headache, sinking chills, night sweats, indigestion and painful urination. About three months ago I noticed an advertisement of Brown's Iron Bitters in a Cincinnati paper. From the first, it seemed to be just the medicine I had long needed. I am now just as strong and hearty as a buck, and weigh nearly one half again as much as I did three months ago."

A WONDERFUL

SCIENTIFIC

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, and possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They can be carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists, who claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal; and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that straining sensation usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, or no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily disproves the eye.

LET THEM TALK.

They say the world's a weary place,
Where tears are never dried,
Where pleasures pass like breath on glass,
And only woes abide,
It may be so—I can not know—
Yet this I dare to say,
My lot has had more glad than sad,
And so it has to-day.

They say that life's a bitter curse—
That hearts are made to ache,
That jest and song are gravely wrong,
And health a vast mistake,
It may be so—I can not know—
But let them talk their fill:
I like my life and love my wife,
And mean to do so still.

"Immigration."—Another View.

BY REV. W. C. BLACK.

Leaving out of the account, at present, John Smith's Texas locality, let us see if those States that have the largest proportion of foreign population are worse off than their neighbors. Are they worse off, for instance, than Mississippi which has hardly been touched by the great tidal wave of foreign immigration. Take Wisconsin for instance. Any one of a dozen other States would answer as well; but I choose Wisconsin because her population, according to the last census, is nearly the same as that of Mississippi. The entire population of Wisconsin now is 1,315,000; that of Mississippi, 1,131,000. Mississippi has a foreign population of only 9,168—less than one per cent. of the whole. Wisconsin has a foreign population of 105,417—more than thirty per cent. of the whole. Wisconsin, therefore, has a percentage of foreign population about thirty times as great as that of Mississippi; and her actual foreign population is nearly forty times as great as that of Mississippi. Now, according to your correspondent's logic, Wisconsin must be worse off than Mississippi, "politically, socially, morally and religiously." Is this the case? My proofs will be taken from the highest authority concerning such matters: viz. the United States census. The following figures are from the census of 1870, except the railroad items:

	Miss.	Wis.
Agricultural products, yearly	$73,000,000	$ 79,000,000
Manufactured products, yearly	8,000,000	77,000,000
Capital invested in manufacturing	4,000 00	41,000,000
Capital invested in banking	800,000	4,600,000
Value of live stock	29,000 000	45,000 000
Miles of railroad	1,126	2,300
Cash value of land	81,000,000	300,000 000
Cash value of farming implements	4,000,000	14,000,000

Now, concerning material prosperity, these figures speak more eloquently than any words at my command. Do they sustain the statement that foreigners are (four-fifths of them) a curse to a State? Do they prove that Wisconsin, having forty times as many foreigners as Mississippi, is forty times worse off? Further comment is a waste of time in this point. But, perhaps, your correspondent will say that there are values greater than material values, and that he is looking not so much at the material prosperity of the State as at its social, moral and religious well-being. Well, on this point also, I prefer to deal in arithmetic rather than rhetoric, proof rather than assertion. Let us go to the census again.

	Miss.	Wis.
Number of teachers in public schools	4,701	9,455
Amount expended for public schools, yearly	$1,242,000	$2,965,000
State normal schools	2	4
Number of newspapers	111	255
Public libraries		234
Value of church property	$2,350,000	$6,905,000

Oh, these foreigners, what a nuisance. True, they sustain twice as many newspapers as we do; they pay twice as much for education as we do; they invest three times as much in houses of worship as we do; they keep [illegible] more public libraries than we do; but yet they are a curse, "politically, socially, morally and religiously." So much for a man's drawing upon his imagination for facts.

Now, as to your correspondent's quotation from John Smith, of Texas. I promised in the outset to show that this quotation does not sustain the conclusion he draws from it. The quotation only shows that the Methodist Church has had to retire before the foreigners in a certain part of Texas. But does it follow that because the Methodist Church has abandoned that field, therefore, the people there are destitute of religion, civilization and morality? Are there no churches among them? Have they no preachers to preach to them in their native tongue? So your correspondence thinks; but John Smith does not say so. He is silent on that point. I am not prepared therefore to say, nor is your correspondent, whether that section of Texas is destitute of churches and preachers, or not. This much, however, is certain. The man who supposes that the foreigners, now resident in the United States, are generally irreligious, is simply very poorly informed. Any man, who can spare a few moments for reading, may easily ascertain that the Lutheran Church, in the United States, numbers no less than 950,000 communicants, most of whom are foreigners by birth or descent. Then to these add the following:

Dutch Reformed	80,000
German Reformed	155 000
Evangelical Association	112,000
Dunkers	60,000
United Brethren	157,000
Mennonite	50,000
Church of God	30,000

This gives a grand total of 1,594,000. Now remember that these figures represent only communicants. The number of persons who are under the influence of these churches is much greater. Then remember that these figures do not include Catholics, or the many thousands of foreigners who affiliate with the Methodist, Baptist and other Protestant Churches. The Southern Methodist Church has an Annual Conference among the Germans; and the Northern Methodist Church has no less than [illegible] Annual Conferences among the foreigners of the United States. The precise membership in these nine Conferences I am not prepared at present to give; but it is considerable. Without going any farther into details, I will now make a statement which will probably startle your correspondent as much as his statement startled me. It is this. The proportion of foreigners in the United States, who are members of some Christian church is very much greater than the proportion of native Americans. If he questions this, just let him say so, and the proof shall be forthcoming.

As to the ignorance of the foreigners in the United States, I have this to say: There are now published in the United States no less than 435 periodicals in foreign languages. Then, of course, there are hundreds of thousands of these foreigners who speak English, read English, and take periodicals published in the English language.

Your correspondent says it is preposterous that Mississippi should desire an increase of population when she numbers a million already. One whole million—twenty-three inhabitants to the square mile, including cities and villages. Ohio, with an area far less than that of Mississippi, sustains a population of more than three million. Little New Jersey, with an area only one-sixth that of Mississippi, has more than a million—149 to the square mile. Whether New Jersey is less prosperous than Mississippi, let any man judge by the statistics of the two States as I have done with Wisconsin. One item only I will mention. New Jersey, with a population just a little less than that of Mississippi, has $19,000,000 invested in church property, while Mississippi has only a little over $2,000,000. Does that indicate that Mississippi is the more prosperous of the two? And, mark you, New Jersey has a foreign population of 221,000, while Mississippi has only 9,000 foreigners. Your correspondent fears that four-fifths of the foreigners, we may some day get, will "cultivate one acre of land, and consume as much as will grow on two." Well, if our foreign immigrants (four-fifths of them) were of that sort, New Jersey, Wisconsin, Illinois, Massachusetts, Minnesota and several other States ought to have been bankrupt long ago; for they have been trying them, for lo! these many years. Are they bankrupt? Are they worse off than we who have never had any foreigners among us? Let figures answer. Your correspondent also conjures up another danger that threatens us if foreigners should come among us. He fears that the other one-fifth will actually "buy some of our lands" and "make fortunes." Well, that would be a calamity indeed. Surely the State could not survive that. Why, sir; a few years ago I knew a large and valuable farm, which, in ante bellum days could not have been bought for twenty dollars per acre, to sell at thirty-one cents per acre. The owner (formerly rich) had to stand by and see it sell at that price to a New Orleans commission merchant. Why? Simply because nobody in Mississippi had any money to invest in land. Suppose we had had at that time Wisconsin's 405,000 foreigners, would that farm have been thus sacrificed? Why, your correspondent does not have to go out of his own county of Madison to find thousands of acres of valuable lands, once in a high state of cultivation, that are now mere fenceless wastes simply for want of purchasers or laborers. Your correspondent also seems to think it would be dreadful calamity if some other language than Anglo-Saxon should be spoken on Columbia's soil. Well, I confess I can not see the point. Literature is not restricted to the English language. Science can be taught, and the great truths of the gospel can be proclaimed as effectively in German as in English. There are periodicals published in the United States in sixteen different languages. What harm it does a State to have two or three languages spoken within its borders I am unable to see. Who does not know that in Pennsylvania and other States some of the very best citizens speak a foreign tongue?

Well, croakers may croak: but they must at last submit to the inevitable. Immigration is upon us. By giving heed to "words without knowledge," Mississippi has hitherto been prevented from reaching that prosperity to which her fertile soil, genial climate and varied resources entitle her. But she has at last waked up from her Rip Van Winkle slumber, and she intends hereafter to reach out her hand and pluck her share of the rich fruitage of muscle and brain which the tree of European immigration holds within her reach. She sees before her a glorious future. Her lands no longer sell at thirty-one cents per acre, and bristle with briers, bramble and broom sedge; but are covered with golden grain and fleecy staple. She sees railways stretching like network in every direction across her bosom. She hears in every city the ring of the hammer, the whirl of the spindle, the clatter of the loom. She beholds churches, schools, colleges, libraries, lyceums and publishing houses spring up as if by enchantment. She believes that her lands were created, not to be idle, but to sustain human life. All her varied resources she looks upon as a gift from a benevolent Creator for use; and she intends that they shall be used. In short, she intends no longer to be behind the age. On the contrary, she proposes to keep step with her Northern sisters in their rapid march towards a higher plain of civilization.

NATCHEZ, Miss., Feb. 6, 1882.

Bishop Wightman.

The Southern Christian Advocate, of February 18, publishes an interesting sketch of Bishop Wightman, by George W. Williams, Esq., the Bishop's brother-in-law. Last week we quoted that part of the article which referred particularly to the Bishop's illness. Below we give Mr. Williams' outline of Bishop Wightman's life:

Bishop Wightman was born in the city of Charleston, S. C., January 29, 1808. He was doubly blessed in having religious parents—the father and mother were both Methodists. His father, Willson Wightman, was an artist, and had considerable poetic talent. He was gentle and retiring in his habits. His mother, whose maiden name was Williams, was a native of Plymouth, England. She was noted for her piety and her fine conversational powers. Mrs. Wightman's time and talents were given to the instruction and training of her children. Before her death—which occurred in 1838—she had the satisfaction of seeing them (eight in number) all members of the church, and two of her sons worthy ministers of the South Carolina Conference. No parents could have been more blessed in their children. Bishop Wightman said he owed his early religious impressions to his devotedly pious mother, whose presence ever sanctified her home.

It was Mrs. Wightman's custom to take her son into her chamber, and have him kneel by her side, while she read the Scriptures and engaged in private prayer for his conversion to God. He was taught as his child mind developed its faculties, the fear of God and the rudiments of Christian instruction. The family worshiped in Trinity Church, and thither he was carried regularly, having been in infancy dedicated to God in holy baptism. The reading of the Scriptures and daily prayers were part of the family life and discipline.

Under the sheltering wing of a home-life such as this, Bishop Wightman passed his earlier years. He was taught to pray; to read the Bible; to revere religion; to avoid evil association; to improve his mind, and to make duty more important than gratification.

This sort of family nuture was infinitely better than to have been brought up in the nursery and courts of a prince. Out of it came "impulses whose native home is heaven;" its sanctity tinged the visions of youth with the glorious lights of faith and hope; its lessons spread their influence over all after life—through occasional dark days; through many working days; many days of gladness and rejoicing.

He was a member and teacher of the first Sunday-school established in Charleston, and heard from childhood the most eminent of the preachers cotemporary with and successors to Asbury and McKendre. He sat under the ministry of Capers, Pierce, Andrew and Olin, when his mind was attaining a stage of development making it capable of appreciating the masterly sermons of men like these, who were then in the prime of their manhood and ministry.

In his seventeenth year, at a camp meeting conducted by James O. Andrew and William Capers, near Haddrell's Point, across the bay from Charleston, he was brought to the full unreserved commitment of his soul to Christ as an Almighty Saviour. His previous life had been marked by the morality that befitted the careful and religious training of a pious home.

The educational influences of that home had much to do in fashioning the character of the illustrious son. The good mother had him, while he was pursuing his college studies, carry on a course of theological reading. Thus it was that her pious training was preparing him for the work he was destined to accomplish. The love and reverence of the Bishop for his sainted mother was beautiful to the last. The memory of the training of that Christian woman was ever indelibly impressed upon the hearts and characters of her sons and daughters. I have often heard the Bishop say that his earliest recollections were of his mother and old Trinity Church.

He was prepared for college under the admirable training of Mr. William E. Bailey, a noted teacher in Charleston of that day. At the age of fourteen he began to study Latin and Greek. Entering as a student in the Charleston College, he graduated at the age of nineteen, taking the first honor of his class. He spoke the valedictory address, and delivered an oration on "The Ruins of Time." He greatly distinguished himself on that occasion, and his friends predicted for the talented youth his future distinction and usefulness.

The late Judge Mitchell King advised the young graduate to study law. The good mother, however, had other and more congenial work for her first-born. She, being one of Wesley's devoted followers, and a disciple of Adam Clark, desired and prayed that he might be a minister of the Methodist Church. She had early consecrated him to that work. Mrs. Wightman had the great satisfaction of seeing her son on his twenty-first birthday admitted into the traveling connection of the South Carolina Conference. Two years later he was ordained deacon by Bishop Soule. We see the humble Sunday-school teacher of old Trinity Church rapidly advanced until he had filled the highest office in the church.

Bishop Wightman's work, the first year, was in the Pee Dee section of the Conference. The young boy-preacher, with the blessings of devoted parents, bid adieu to the home so dear to him. He traveled on horseback in storm and in sunshine; often riding thirty miles a day and preaching three times. The malarial swamps of the Pee Dee did not deter him from a zealous discharge of his duties. He received one hundred dollars for the twelve months toil, which he preferred to a salary of one thousand dollars which was offered him as teacher in one of the schools. He was greatly blessed in his labors—nearly a thousand persons were received into the church as the fruits of his first year's ministerial work. From the commencement of his entry in the ministry he gave promise of great success.

When only twenty one years old, he was stationed in Charlestou. From 1834 to 1839 he was connected with Randolph Macon College, Virginia; first as agent for the endowment fund, and then as professor of English literature. Returning to the South Carolina Conference in 1839, he was appointed to the responsible position of presiding elder of Cokesbury district. In his thirty second year he was elected a delegate to the General Conference. At that Conference he was appointed editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, which was then in its infancy. Bishop Wightman devoted fourteen years of the prime and vigor of his life in making this important church organ one of the best religious newspapers published in the Union. Under his able management its circulation increased to twelve thousand. For a number of years his devoted friend, T. O. Summers, D. D., was associate editor. The Advocate had the credit of introducing the first steam printing press in the South.

Bishop Wightman was a clear, exact and forcible writer. In addition to his masterly articles in his regular editorial work, he wrote extensively for the periodical press of the church, and was the author of the "Life of Bishop Capers." While editor, he held by appointment of the General Conference the treasurership of the Missionary Society of the Southern Church.

In 1854 he was elected president of Wofford College at its opening, and in 1859 chancellor of the Southern University, Greensboro, Alabama. As president and chancellor, he was greatly beloved and revered by his pupils. He ever felt a deep concern for the educational institutions of the church. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by the Randolph Macon College, and degree of LL.D. by the Charleston College.

He was elected one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1866. He was then in his fifty-ninth year, and a resident of Greensboro, Ala.

The return of Bishop Wightman to Charleston—his native city—after an absence of thirteen years, with a view of making it his home, was hailed with delight by his numerous friends. His fellow-citizens generally felt a just pride in his election to the highest office in the church. They felt he was in all respects worthy of the position to which he had been promoted.

From the time Bishop Wightman entered upon his high and holy office, he was diligent and faithful in the discharge of his duties. His field of labors extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and from Mexico to the Rocky mountains.

The Bishop's long separation each year from his family, and the fatiguing journeys, were borne by him with Christian fortitude. Bishop Wightman was a loving husband, tender parent and sincere friend. It was no ordinary sacrifice to be separated from those so dear to him, often two-thirds of each year. From childhood to the grave, he faithfully discharged every duty, whether humble or exalted, which came in his way.

Bishop Wightman was an able presiding officer and a zealous advocate of all church interests. Notwithstanding he sympathized with the ministers and people, and was kind and conciliatory, yet he was firm, prudent and dignified.

His long journeys to the Northwest proved too much for one who had passed his "threescore and ten." The Bishop never spared himself when duty had to be performed; he had, however, reached a period in his life when there was a perceptible diminution of strength, without a corresponding decline in energy and disposition to work.

His last tour, which was fatiguing and full of personal danger, carried him through the Indian Territory to the Colorado and Montana Conferences. To reach these Conferences he had to pass through bands of hostile Indians, and on the brink of chasms and gorges more than two thousand feet in almost perpendicular depth.

The Bishop said it made his head swim when he looked down into the deep chasms and then up to the giddy heights of the mountains, white with almost perpetual snow. Who but a self-sacrificing Methodist Bishop would travel surrounded by savage tribes of Indians over precipitous mountains nine thousand feet high to meet a dozen ignorant ministers?

Bishop Wightman at that time was not in favor of establishing Conferences in these remote States and Territories, but the General Conference thought otherwise, and he ever obeyed its mandates. I noticed after the Bishop's return from those fatiguing journeys that he was much enfeebled. This was the first indication of the breaking up of his health. He, however, continued to labor at the Annual and District Conferences, traveling through the malarial swamps of the Carolinas and Virginia, when he should have been resting. It was hoped that a few months rest in the bracing mountain climate of North Carolina would quite restore the Bishop to his former good health.

His health, however, did not improve by his visit to the mountains; he returned to Charleston in the fall of 1880, too feeble to attend Marion Conference. During the winter of 1880 and spring of 1881 the Bishop continued quite feeble—seldom leaving his room. In July, 1881 a change to Sullivan's Island was recommended by his ever kind friend, Dr. J. R. Mood, who, during the Bishop's sickness visited him almost daily. The refreshing sea breezes seemed for a time to greatly benefit him. Not wishing to have him remain on the island during the season of equinoctial gales, he was removed to Summerville, just in time to escape a severe gale which swept over Sullivan's Island. The quiet retreat into the pine lands, twenty miles from Charleston, proved quite beneficial. A perceptible improvement was noted in the Bishop's health. It was believed by his friends that his great desire to resume his episcopal work, and preside at the Virginia Conference, would be gratified. Through the kindness of his friend, Col. J. B. Peck, superintendent of the South Carolina railroad, arrangements were being made for a comfortable journey to the Virginia Conference. The Bishop, however, while walking had a severe fall; this accident kept him sometime in his room. His health becoming more and more feeble, the Bishop reluctantly gave up all hope of being able to attend the Conference. The conviction that he could no longer travel in the discharge of his duties at times saddened him.

Mr. Spurgeon at Mentone.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, in the January number of the Sword and Trowel,

So far as these notes are personal to the editor, they must needs be brief. Little can be said of a good night's rest; when you can talk about sleep it must have been unrefreshing, and in our experience the most complete restfulness is that in which there are no incidents worthy of record. We have been in a land where the sun's first beams call you to open the window and let in the balmy air; where in midwinter the flowers which exist in our conservatories are flourishing and flowering in the open garden,—this alone is a joy. Added to this, the people speak no English, and do not know us by repute, so that when we walk the streets we are not questioned or begged of by every third person. Quite enough of callers are on hand to keep the day from stagnation, but one is sometimes left alone, and this is no mean blessing. Besides, there are the olive gardens and the woods, and here one can be lost to every human eye. As far as perfect repose can be had on earth we have had five weeks of it, and we are thankful. On returning to London we look up with deep anxiety and fervent hope, longing for, and expecting a blessing.

Mr. Moody's Sabbath at the Tabernacle must be recorded, for we are greatly obliged to him for undertaking the service in the midst of his pressing engagements. The enormous crowds that gathered created a great and serious danger, which would have driven most men to despair, but our deacon, Mr. Murrell, faced the difficulty and passed through it. Extraordinary precautions had to be taken to preserve life and limb. If you have twelve thousand people all eager to get into a building which can not hold more than six thousand, what can you do? Our seat-holders in the evening most commendably lent their tickets to others, and thus gave a second set of people the opportunity of hearing the great evangelist; but this, of course, did not lessen the heavy pressure of the eager multitude. We see clear evidence that if Messrs. Moody and Sankey again visit London no building will be sufficiently capacious to hold the crowds who will gather to hear them. Their hold upon the multitude has by no means diminished. May the Lord send a great blessing upon their efforts, and may London, on this occasion, have a double portion of the resulting benefit.

Good Words.

I stand upon the mount of God
With sunlight in my soul;
I hear the storms in vales beneath,
I hear the thunders roll.
But I am calm with thee, my God,
Beneath these glorious skies;
And to the height on which I stand
Nor storms nor clouds can rise.

—A thoughtful use and expenditure of all God's gifts, on principles drawn from a knowledge of his will, and for objects not terminating with self is the duty that corresponds to the great fact of God's ownership of all. If we use his gifts to minister to our own vanity or frivolity or love of ease or display; if "an intolerable deal" of all we have is used for ourselves, and a poor "tha-forth" for others, then for all our outward Christianity, the stern old love applied, your riches are corrupted and the rest of them shall be against you."—Alexander McLaren, D. D.

—If any one ever felt the beauty of this world it was Christ. The beauty of the lily nestling in the grass—he felt it all; but the beauty which he exhibited in life was the stern loveliness of moral action; it was the beauty of obedience; of noble deeds, of unconquerable fidelity, of unswerving truth, of divine self-devotion. The cross tells us that is the true beautiful which is divine; and inward, not an outward beauty, which rejects and turns away sternly from the meretricious forms of the outward world.—F. W. Robertson.

—If we call him great who planned the Cathedral of St. Peter, with all its massiveness and beauty; if they call the old masters great whose paintings hang on the monastery and chapel walls, is not she (the mother) great who is building up characters for the service of God, who is painting on the soft canvass the beauty and strength of Jesus the Christ?—A. E. Kittredge.

—The readiness for death is that of character, not of occupation; and God does not wish me to be always thinking about dying. He wants me to live, he wants me to walk with himself while I live, and if I do that, I may leave the dying to take care of itself, or rather he will take care of the dying.—Rev. W. M. Taylor, D. D.

—As the eye which has gazed at the sun can not immediately discern any other object; as a man who has been accustomed to behold the ocean turns with contempt from a stagnant pool: so the mind which has contemplated eternity, overlooks and despises the things of time.—Edward Payson.

—Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindness, and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart, and secure comfort.

—Let no man indulge the deceptive thought that because the general spirit of his life is right his minor short comings shall bear no bitter fruit.

—Life is not done, and our Christian character is not won, so long as God has anything left for us to suffer, or anything left for us to do.—F. W. Robertson.

—No work is worth doing that can not be turned to moral account. It must perish unless God is in it.

—None are ruined by the justice of God, but those who hate to be reformed by the grace of God.

FANCY'S FLIGHT.

BY INVALID.

It is when the shadows gather, shutting out the after glow,
When the holy twilight angels wing their way to earth below,
And the dusky night is brooding, spreads her starry wings o'er all,
It is then my fancy wanders, and past memories recall.

But to-night I still the voices that would whisper of the past,
For I would not have one shadow on the brow of fancy cast,
Memory, so dear and sacred, in my heart embalmed, entombed,
And the dust and ashes gather where the rosy garlands bloomed.

It would resurrect pale sorrow, and I would not weep to-night,
For the pictured face of fancy I would have forever bright:
Memory would call around me but a ghostly, spectral band,
And the dearest are forever past the touch of lip and hand.

I would only wake to anguish, from my reverie so sweet,
When the ones I thought around me were not here for me to greet.
Even love's sweet voice would fill me with its anguish and its pain,
Memory would hold me captive, fettered with its cruel chain.

Go to-night fair, swift winged fancy, to the ones I love so well,
Go and take to each a message, of my pure affection tell;
Then return and paint a picture, for each one is fair I know,
Good and beautiful I deem them, for my heart has told me so.

Far away I send thee, fancy, over land and tide to-night,
Like a dove my message bearing, spread thy starry wings for flight.
Over leagues of field and forest, far away, has fancy flown,
Enters now a peaceful cottage, lingers with a friend long known.

If there my heart oft wanders, to my childhood's first true friend,
And, where'er I pray to Heaven, for her, too, a prayer I send;
'Tis a picture fair that fancy brings me from that home to-night,
'Tis a mother, and beside her kneels a child-form robed in white.

Now methinks the Saviour listens, and the angels linger there,
As that mother teaches "Lora," to repeat her evening prayer.
Hear that prayer, "O loving Jesus," and that soul in "safety keep,"
Hear the words so sweetly murmured—"Now I lay me down to sleep."

Now the brown eyes close in slumber, still that mother lingers there,
Brushes back the silken tresses from the rosy face so fair,
Kisses now the lips so softly of her sinless, sleeping child,
She dreamily [illegible] the angels—while she slept she smiled.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1882—MARK IV, 35-41.

GOLDEN TEXT—"He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still." Psalms cvii, 29.

STILLING THE TEMPEST.

35. And the same day, when the even was come, he saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side.

36. And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship. And there were also with him other little ships.

37. And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full.

38. And he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish?

39. And he arose, an rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm.

40. And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have no faith?

41. And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

Our lesson begins on the evening of a day of wonderful labor. The Son of man crowded more into one day than we can conceive; the days of the three years of his earthly life's work were occupied by labors so many and so varied that, were they all told, the world would believe none. John said that were all he did and said written the world could not contain the books. He did not mean that this broad earth could not furnish shelf-room for so vast a library, but rather that the recital of his stupendous and multitudinous labors would stagger the minds of men, and the result would be the rejection of all. We have in the gospel history only here and there specimens of his skill, mere hints of his works; the greater number of his miracles and discourses are left untold. The reserved history, the unrecorded silent history of our Lord, proves the divinity of Scriptures as much as does its revealed parts. The Bible is wonderful for what it does not reveal. Men can only bear the truth when administered in small portions. Men can get used to anything; even the truth itself can be "brought into contempt." I have thought that the lavish distribution of the Lord's gracious words and works accounted for some of the unbelief of those who heard him. We live in an age and under a system better adapted to win credence than that of sight and hearing of the ear.

This busy day in question had been taken up in casting out devils, preaching a sermon, meeting the organized and bitter opposition of his enemies, and the more annoying and distressing interference of his own kin, who were attempting to interdict him as a madman. The evening finds him still preaching from his boat to an eager, thronging multitude. But the time came for him to end this sermon, which he did by giving orders to weigh anchor, and put out for the eastern shore of the lake, some three leagues distant, but in the dusk of the evening, out of sight. The multitude, loth to leave, were only dismissed when assured that he would preach no more, and when they saw the boat receding from the shore. They took him even as he was in the ship, that is to say, there was no going ashore for baggage, or even a jug of water. Promptly upon the order "Let us pass over unto the other side," the sail was hoisted, and the boat headed for the farther shore.

Some commentators suppose that this night-sail across the lake was to carry the over-worked Master to a place of solitude, where he could rest and recuperate his strength, now all but spent by the exhausting labors of this busy day. Well, if this was his purpose, then this wild, rocky coast of Gadara, with its solitude and blankness, was the place; but our Lord never made personal ease or rest a motive. His whole life was laid out before him in appointments made by his Father; he worked to these. His labors were without pause and without haste. Even when he sat on the well, being weary, he was there to fulfill an appointment with the woman of Samaria, who was to come hither to draw water. This night voyage was part of his plan, and the time came for him to meet it, and he left as he was, not consulting time or tide. There was a work for him to do on this "other side," a soul to be delivered, a victory to be won. There, among the rocks and caves of this barren shore, Satan had, in cruel tyranny, enslaved a soul. Jesus had made the deliverance of this poor, frenzied, devil-possessed soul one of his appointments, and he was on his way to fill it. This shaped the course of the boat, and fixed the time of his departure.

Christ was weary, and no sooner was the vessel under way than he was found asleep on the deck, his head pillowed on the helman's cushion. This distance across was a short run with fair wind and smooth sea, but while Jesus was sleeping the God of the sea sent down a storm of wind upon the lake, which drove the little fisher-boat from her course, and the voyage became one of toil and danger, and with promise of no speedy arrival on the other side. Most all the night was spent in beating about, and daylight brought them to the shore—an all night trip. This weather delay gave the worker longer time for rest; his slumber might have been longer had he not been aroused by the cry of unbelief of those fearful sailors. The Lord sent this storm upon the sea. He came in the winds to help his Righteous servant and give his beloved sleep. The mackerel fishermen, as long as the sea is smooth, must tend their lines day and night; but when the wind springs up, and the sea begins to roll, the fish cease feeding, and descend to the quiet depths of the sea; so the storm-cloud becomes the fishers harbinger of rest. His lines are coiled, and he lies down to sleep and dream, rocked in the cradle of the deep.

So with Jesus; his rest times were not of his own choosing, but of Heaven's appointing. His Father arranged his rest days. He found his rests in between appointments, in going from one to the other. These are the only true rest-times for his followers. Long rides in the crowded train, or through the lonely forest, going about doing good, delays, rainy Sundays, Providential hinderances, these are the only rests authorized by our Examplar. Away with summer vacations, arranged by a weary congregation, who make up a purse to send the preacher off, that they may themselves be relieved of church going for the heated term. Depend upon it the Lord will see to it that his servants have rest, even though he must stir up a storm to give it.

But the Saviour's slumber was rudely broken by the cry of perishing men, and so we who follow our Lord may look to have our profoundest rest over and anon disturbed by the cry of fearling unbelieving and perishing men.

The Master aroused, he at once rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea: "Peace be still." He spoke as if to a rational agent, as if Satan had stirred up the winds, which, in their turn, had stirred the sea. He rebuked the winds just as he did the howling demoniac and the raging fever. The wind reverently obeyed him, and there was a great calm. The mysterious wind, coming and going suddenly, "thou canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth," ceased at his word; this may have been a mere coincidence, like the sailor bringing the wind with his whistle, but the calm of the sea never. After a storm the waves of the sea continue to heave and roll for hours after the wind dies, as if they had been stirred to their profoundest depths, but in this case the winds and the seas obey him. Oh! wonder-working man; thy word can still a greater storm, even the storms which rage in human souls. Speak thy word of peace to the poor, frenzied man whose soul is filled with a legion of warring demons. Behold him do it, and see the calm peace of the man as he sits clothed, and in his right mind, looking at the face of his Deliverer.

This was the object of Jesus' voyage to Gadara to deliver this soul, to show his power over Satan when ensconsed a legion strong in the soul and body of a man.

The rebuke Christ gave the fearing disciples was merited. They had no right or reason to fear. This was the Master's trip; they need have no fear; it was his enterprise; he had given the order: "Let us pass over." Why are ye so fearful; how is it ye have no faith. Their conduct was proof of their utter lack of confidence in him. They ought to have let him sleep; they were carrying a greater man than Cæsar; you are carrying Jesus; you need fear nothing. This miracle has furnished the church, in all ages, confidence in every enterprise; the only question to be settled was is Christ aboard? Is this his voyage? Is he in this work? "The old ship of Zion," which the church has sung so long, and is to this day loved so well, embodies in song the teachings of this lesson.

This noble craft, on which so many have taken passage to the other shore, staunch as she is, has, as her chief, recommendation that Jesus is her captain.

"Immigration."

It is of course discourteous for an outsider to even ask to go into a newspaper and oppose the policy of its own editorial staff. It seems to be the well-settled doctrine of late years that editors are to be inquired of in all questionable matters. They are presumed to know. So I may reasonably presume that the following will find its way, by a short route, to the place where most that is written now-a-days ought to go.

An editorial in the ADVOCATE of February 2, on "Immigration," is not suited to Mississippi, though it seems to have been written, if not for Mississippi especially, for this region generally. It broadly opposes the introduction of both labor and capital into Mississippi. This meets the disfavor of, in my judgment, most of the property owners and best citizens of this State.

The introduction of capital and labor from older to newer countries is by no means a new subject. It made New England what it is. It made New York what it is. It made Pennsylvania and Maryland and Virginia, and the Carolinas what they are. It made Georgia a State, and made Alabama a State. It changed Mississippi from a Spanish "settlement," in and around "the Natchez," to what it is. What made "the West?" and out of what was it made? Who made a city down on that crescent bend? But for immigration this country would to-day be a British colony east of the Allegheny mountains.

I can not argue this general subject. I do not know how. We have more domain, more timber, more navigable streams, more coal and iron ore, more water power, and more sunshine in proportion, than we have money and muscle. And there are thousands of men, with a good stock of muscle, who have no domain. Separate they are unprofitable. Together they might be profitable.

You say the thrifty immigrant would buy our land, and himself be profited. I am glad to believe it. I suppose he would pay for the land. That is the way we have been doing heretofore, for we are all immigrants in this country.

You say some of the immigrants would, in all likelihood, be bad citizens. I presume they would. There is back action in all human affairs, but that does not justify non-action. In mechanism a wheel has never been made that did not, to some extent, retard the motion it was intended to accelerate. But that does not prove it best to give up all machinery.

You say foreign immigrants would foreignize our country. There is some force in this. It takes three or four generations to thoroughly Americanize some foreigners. The Mohawk was settled by Dutch, and Governaire Schuyldhaire was Governor, and Now York has prospered. Americans will dominate this country for some time yet.

Again, "They," the foreign immigrants, "will have no sympathy with our laws, our customs or our religion." And Texas is cited.

This religious aspect of the question comes strangely from a religious quarter. "They don't sympathize with our religion." Well, would they do any better over yonder? Here there is or may be at least some hope of their reform. There there is little or none. So Christianity would say, Bring them here.

The reference to Texas is unfortunate for the non-immigration argument. It is more than unfortunate. It shivers it into shreds. Look at Texas fifty years ago, in the days of Santa Ana, and Mexican ponies and rancheros. I remember it. And then look at it now. How many bales last year? A million, I believe. How many Methodist Annual Conferences and preachers? and other Protestant ministers? any schools? any literature? any railroads?

The question of immigration is the question of Indian canoes and rifles, and jerked bear meat, and blankets and moccasins, and Spanish ranches and lassos on the one hand, and States, civilization, agriculture, commerce, railroads, steamboats, schools, colleges, literature, towns and cities, cotton, spindles and looms and furnaces, and Bibles and churches, and Christianity and editors, and a few other such like things on the other. I prefer the latter.

Did you hear Gen. Gordon's speech, a few days ago, on this subject, before the Mississippi Legislature? Well, you had better read it, as you may see it in the newspapers. And I suggest that you notice his comparisons of Massachusetts and Georgia, and with Mississippi and Georgia with Mississippi, and the reasons for those disparities. His notions of political economy differ from those of the ADVOCATE.

R. ABBEY.

Note by the Editor.—The above article, from Dr. Abbey, is in reply to one from Rev. W. L. C. Hunnicutt. The editor of the ADVOCATE does not hold himself responsible for the views of the corresponding editors, nor for the views of other contributors. Within the limits of propriety they are free to discuss questions in their own way. The admission of Bro. Hunnicutt's article does by no means commit the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE against immigration.

From the Work.

NEWTON CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: This is my third year on this circuit; there are now six churches on the work, to-wit: Newton, Hickory, Garlandsville, Spring Hill, Hickmans Chapel and Pleasant Grove, numbering nearly four hundred members. There are regularly organized Sunday-School Foreign Missionary Societies at the two former places. We hope to have more at other churches. In this way we can the better identify the children with the missionary cause, and educate the coming generations in the duty of spreading the gospel over the world. We have a good camp ground on the circuit; some new tents put up last year, others are speaking of tenting this year. I am on my second round, and, despite the heavy rains and swollen streams, I have not missed an appointment. I hope and am praying and laboring that the present year may be even better than the two former. I desire very much to get the ADVOCATE at least in every Methodist family on the circuit. I find it a wonderful help to me in my work. I notice that those who take it are our best informed and most liberal members. A good sister, a widow, remarked to me the other day that she had rather retrench some in food and raiment than to do without her ADVOCATE. I must tell you of a pleasant incident that happened the other day. The widow of our beloved brother, Rev. G. W. Chatfield, paid us a visit at the parsonage, and, while looking over her ADVOCATE, her eye fell upon Bro. D. P. Bradford's article, telling what the good people of his charge did in visiting his home, and leaving with his dining table loaded with good things, her heart took fire, and she said: "We must not be behind in this matter." She put on her hat, and away she went, to Dr. Watts. To mention the matter was enough for such people as we have here and elsewhere on the work. The time was appointed "to take us by surprise," and at the time they came, young and old, in and out of the church, and some of other churches, and children, and the parsonage was crowded with happy hearts and smiling faces. When the hour came to disperse we sang: "Shall we gather at the river." A benediction was pronounced by the pastor, and so we parted for the night. When we looked on the dining table, behold! it was loaded with good things, and substantial. A sealed envelop was found on the table, containing a list of the names of donors of a barrel of flour, which was sent as next morning by Mr. Watts, with as nice a piece of pickled beef as I ever saw, and a small amount of money was handed in by good friends. Do you ask me if the inmates of the preacher's home appreciated these kind gifts? Most assuredly; but more the heart that was in the matter. We make a bow and say, thank you, dear friends. I must not forget to say that since then the energetic steward at Spring Hill Church came fifteen miles, and brought some sweet potatoes and provender for the faithful horse, John. May the Father's blessing be upon all.

FEBRUARY 14, 1882.

NATCHEZ, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: This station received, during the last Conference year, forty-three accessions to its membership, thirty-two by certificate and eleven on profession of faith. Of the eleven last named eight were pupils of the Sunday-school. In this respect the Natchez Sunday-school is, I think, superior to any I know of. It is emphatically "the nursery of the church." As a rule, our young people, at a suitable age, unite with the church—our church. One of those "lambs of the flock," received last year, has passed from the church militant to the church triumphant, leaving behind her the sweet, refreshing aroma of a life consecrated to her Maker's service, and a dying testimony which, to a parent's heart, is "more precious than rubies."

This Sunday school, I suppose, need not fear to compare its financial exhibit with that of any other school in our church. Last year its expenditures were as follows: for missions, $125; for books, etc., $102; for improvements on Sunday-school room, $360. Of this last amount the sum of $160 was on hand at the commencement of the year, leaving $200 raised during the year. This gives a total of $487 raised by the Sunday-school. In proportion to numerical and financial strength, my judgment is that no school in the land can show a better record. And the work goes on. Since Conference a handsome sum has been raised for further improvements on the Sunday-school room. The success of the school in this regard is partly due to the fact that the pupils have organized themselves into two societies, each having a specific end in view, viz.: a Miss'y Society and a Young Folks' Aid Society. The Miss'y Society supports the pastor of Hunnicutt Chapel, in China, and pays something to home missions besides.

In the church we have three societies, composed principally of ladies—the Ladies' Aid Society, the Parsonage Society and the Benevolent Society. The ladies composing these societies are a noble band of workers, whose zeal, energy, enterprise and perseverance are worthy of high praise and general emulation.

To the Ladies' Aid Society the church is largely indebted for aid in the construction of its spacious and elegant house of worship. This society has now on hand several hundred dollars to be expended in improvements on the church edifice.

The Benevolent Society, organized last summer, raised about $60 during the year for the poor. The Parsonage Society is full of liberal devisings for the comfort of the pastor and his family. During the present year the parsonage has been enlarged and improved.

Since the last Annual Conference there have been eighteen accessions to our membership, eight of them by certificate. There has been recently a very marked increase of spirituality in the church. The attendance upon prayer meetings has increased very considerably. The attendance upon class meetings has increased about three hundred per cent. Several new family altars have been erected, and some have been repaired which had long lain in ruins. The outlook is decidedly encouraging.

Obituaries.

JORDAN—MRS. JANE M. JORDAN was born in Pittsburg, Pa., May 14, 1816, [illegible] I, was the daughter of George and [illegible] and granddaughter of Rev. [illegible] Asbury, one of the early [illegible] Methodist. Losing her mother [illegible] infancy, she was reared [illegible] young, she was educated with her four sisters at Edgeworth Seminary, Braddocksfield, Pa. The principal, Mrs. Oliver, bearing the sobriquet of "Mother," carried out the name to the letter, particularly in the religious training of her pupils. Here she fully improved the many advantages given her; and, being of a retentive mind, attained to a high cultivation of taste. Though early impressed, she did not make an outward profession of religion till after marriage. She moved to St. Louis, Mo., with her father's family in 1836; from there to St. Charles, Mo., where she married Mr. E. H. Jordan, a merchant of that place. Under the pastorate of Rev. John Fielding, her uncle, then president of St. Charles College, she joined the Methodist Church. Her conversion was bright and satisfactory. Never a doubting Christian, she was conscious of her daily need of that cleansing blood—the effect of which was shown in her consistent life. She was a cheerful Christian, and, of so sprightly a disposition, she often mourned over her exuberance of spirit. This, however, to her friends, only presented religion in its most winning phase. While afterwards making her home in St. Louis, she worshiped in the old Fourth Street Church, Dr. Boyle being her pastor, and here was the beginning of that soul refining process, called "affliction," which followed her to the end. Here she buried two beautiful children in one week; then leaving St. Louis for her new home in Shreveport, the first letter brought tidings of the sudden death of her much beloved step-daughter and companion, aged nineteen years. She lost two other babes in quick succession; but the great shock of her life was the loss of her gifted daughter by the burning of the Mattie Stephens, sadly remembered by many in the South. She was long recovering her wonted vivacity, but proved at last that "God washes the eyes until they can behold the invisible land where tears shall come no more." Then an aged father was watched over as a mother over an infant; then a declining devoted husband, whose encomiums she justly deserved when he said to her: "You surely have fulfilled that passage in Proverbs, 'Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her.'" Her busy hands were ever active in making others happy, while self-forgetting. Year after year busy from the delicate tinting of a landscape or flower, down to the matter-of fact duties of the housewife—even when

"Hands that were nerved with corded veins;
Hands that were roughened with toil and brown;
Hands that were patiently bearing the cross,
Bearing the cross and wearing the crown."

Once, in speaking to the writer of her approaching end, she said: "Last night, for a moment, all the terrors of death were presented to me; but, oh, so great was my joy when this passage came up, 'I hold the key of death and hell,' I exclaimed aloud, that is my Saviour, who will go with me through the dark valley; and on this promise I rested sweetly."

Is it to be wondered that after such a life, when she lay down to die, her Saviour's presence was ever with her, and that she constantly repeated: "The everlasting arms are underneath me," "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard," etc.

Such a life has been an inspiration to many, and truly to one to whom she was mother, friend,

SISTER.

In addition to the above from Mrs. Walters, sister of Mrs. Jordan, Rev. J. T. Sawyer writes as follows:

As Sister Jordan's pastor during the last year, I wish to bear my testimony to her exalted character and great worth. She was undoubtedly a remarkable person. Her stock of information on general subjects was ample, and her naturally acute and brilliant intellect had been thoroughly cultivated: hence, she was ready, accurate and full in the discussion of any subject presented to her. She seemed equally at home if the subject had reference to nature, science, history, the Bible and Christianity, or to most any thing else. Her sprightliness and vivacity were unusual, and her memory was wonderful. Among her friends, her decision as to a fact, or event, or doctrine, was taken as correct and final. Though called more than many to suffer in the furnace of affliction, her joyous spirit seemed never to desert her; and throughout all her conversation in health, or sickness, there were, over and anon, the flashings of genuine wit, a vein of humor being in her as an essential part of herself. This was a charm that won upon all who knew her. Her Christianity was of the highest type. Broad and tender in her sympathies for others, and loving her Saviour with the thorough devotion of a heart all his, her life was "abundant in labors" of love, and presented a consistency and perfection that all saw and acknowledged. She surely had the mind and spirit of the Master. She was an humble, consecrated follower of Christ, counting it her chief joy to do his will. Many and frequent were the kindly words she spoke, and they, with her numberless deeds of quiet, unostentatious Christian charity, are recorded on high. She spoke in class with an unction from above, and what she said discovered that she had deep experience in the Divine life. Missed she will ever be by children and grandchildren and other loved ones; for the quiet, gentle, loving movement of her Christian life in the circle of home shed light and gladness and daily blessing on all. Missed she is by the many friends who ever counted it a treasured privilege to know her and possess her friendship. Missed in the house of God, the place of prayer and class-room, the church has lost one of the choicest, most useful and thoroughly spiritual members that ever knelt at her altars. Our loss is her eternal gain; poorer are we on earth, but richer is heaven for her going there. May her godly life be sanctified to the everlasting good of the loved ones left on the shores of time, having the voyage yet to make.

The editor of the ADVOCATE would also add a few words. Sister Jordan was under our pastoral care in 1851-52, and, subsequently, for a time during the war. We knew her well and long, and among all the Christian women we have known we have not known her superior for intelligence, refinement, and complete consecration to Christ and his cause. Hers was indeed a noble character. In all the relations of life she was a model of faithfulness and of womanly devotion. Her death is indeed a loss to all that knew her, and a loss to the church, and to the community in which she lived. Deeply do we sorrow over her departure. But it is well. She has entered into rest.

BEARD.—Whereas, Our Heavenly Father in his wise but inscrutable providence, has removed from our fold our beloved Brother Rev. Thomas L. Beard, who departed this life Nov. 17, 1881, the Pastor's Association of Humboldt, Tenn., of which he was an honorary member, desire to place upon record its sincere appreciation of his worth as a man and a brother beloved in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, to express our deep sense of the loss which we have sustained by his death, and to offer our heart-felt sympathy with his sorrowing family in their sad bereavement;

Resolved, That in the death of Brother Beard we mourn the loss of one who was in all the relations of life an upright man and a sincere Christian, whose character, transformed by divine grace with the image of his Redeemer, shone through a long life not only with steady but increasing brightness, manifesting in every day life those characteristics which mark the truly godly man. As his life drew near its close he gave evidence of that ripening of his Christian grace which forcibly to those who knew him best his speedy entrance upon his reward. As a minister he was through many years of arduous labors faithful to his holy calling, and received that best proof of his Master's approbation, a rich harvest of souls as seals to his ministry. As a preacher he was diligent, watching with singular fidelity over the flocks committed to his charge, and in the later years, though laid aside from the active ministry by increasing infirmities, he lost none of his great interest in the work of his life. As a minister and brother it was delightful to know him, for to know him was to love him. He was a sincere Methodist, and labored conscientiously to promote the cause of the Church of his choice; but his sympathies were large and his Christian charity embraced with unfeigned affection all who loved the Lord Jesus Christ, and his hearty co-operation and uniform courtesy won the hearts of his ministerial brethren of other denominations. While we mourn his death with no common sorrow, we rejoice with exceeding joy that our loss, which is only for a little while, is his eternal gain. To his bereaved family, as an association of ministers who knew him and loved him for his work's sake, we tender our cordial sympathy and condolence, and commend them to that sacred Word he loved and preached so long as an unfailing source of comfort and joy; and we do unite our prayers for the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit with them as a sweet comforter, and that at least they with ourselves may be made partakers of his joy through the rich grace of our common Lord in that blest land where sorrow and parting is unknown, for

Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet
Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet;
While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.

FOLKES—MRS. MARY MAGRUDER FOLKES, late consort of Benjamin Folkes, Esq., of Warren county, Miss., departed this life on December 27, 1881 at the family mansion fifteen miles from Vicksburg. Mrs. Folkes was a model woman; a gentle, faithful, humble Christian. Her life and heart were early given to the cause of the Redeemer, and she held on in her useful Christian life in a most consistent and blessed course to the end. She passed away in the sixtieth year of her age. Her maiden name was Grayson. She was a granddaughter of the late Judge Covington of precious memory in our State and Church.

Her home was made a perpetual benediction by her genial care and painstaking effort to minister to the comfort and happiness of its inmates. Such a wife! Such a neighbor! Such a friend! Benevolent, forbearing, patient, good. The church is rapidly laying in the dust her noble women who have been pillars in our Zion, and whose administrations have given courage and zeal to our ministers, and support and comfort to the toiling membership of our church. Eleven such women perished in the yellow fever scourge in 1878 in Warren circuit. Our excellent Sister Folkes belonged to that blessed constellation of noble Christian women who, together, have given strength, time and spiritual vigor for many past years to the cause of the blessed Master. Peace to the memory of departed worth! Loved and honored by her husband and neighbors, she has left a fragrant name, and an example worthy the imitation of the Christian women who knew and loved her. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

HE LEADS US ON.

He leads us on
By paths we did not know,
Upward he leads us, though our steps be slow,
Though oft we falter and forget on the way,
Though storms and darkness oft obscure the day,
Yet when the clouds are gone
We know he leads us on.

He leads us on
Through all the mingled years;
Past all our dreams and hopes, and doubts and fears
He guides our steps. Through all the tangled maze
Of sin, of sorrow, and o'erclouded days
We know his will is done;
And still he leads us on.

And he, at last,
After the weary strife,
After the restless fever we call life,
After the dreariness, the aching pain,
The wayward struggles which have proved in vain,
After our toils are past
Will give us rest at last.

Southern Methodism and Six Million of Negroes.

BY W. W. BENNETT, D. D.

The attempt to arraign the Southern Methodist Church for neglect of the religious interests of the negroes in the South since the close of the civil war is one of the many strange things of the present day. The good intentions of those who have done this can not be doubted, but certainly they have not looked at the question in all its aspects and bearings.

If we are as guilty as it is claimed we are, hardly any punishment is too severe for us. If we have dropped these people deliberately and of choice, when we could have had access to them, and seen them sink deeper into ignorance, vice and the barbarous customs of their ancestors, without stretching out a helping hand, we merit the opprobrium of the civilized world.

But have we been guilty of such unchristian, such inhuman conduct? Nay, have we been guilty of any lack of duty to them more than to any other class, considering the circumstances that have surrounded them and us?

It is not wise to leap to conclusions, for in so doing we pass over essential facts that would, if properly considered, greatly modify, if not wholly change our opinions, and lead to far different conclusions.

At the risk of being charged with looking back to the works of "the fathers," and of laying "flattering unction" to our souls, drawn from their heroic labors for this class, and the splendid results, we may ask, What was the attitude of the Southern Methodist Church toward the negro at the close of the war? The answer is already recorded in history, and however the facts may be distorted or obscured by passion, prejudice, or overheated zeal, they are facts, and will so stand, to be known and read of all men. As the results of our Christian labors among this people we had over 20,000 members enrolled, and an equal number of their children under instruction in Sunday-schools. And to continue the work the church stood ready, according to the means and opportunities left her in her then shattered and disorganized condition. It was neither the wish nor purpose of the church to give up her work among this or any other class, but she was forced to do it in great measure by stress of circumstances. It is not pleasant to recall the strife and bitterness of that period, but the vindication of our character as Christian people demand it.

At the close of the war a wide chasm yawned between the whites and the blacks of the South. This chasm was not a necessary result of the issues of the war. It was dug by those who sought to use the negro to secure their own nefarious ends. This is plain to every man that lived in the South and noted the course of events.

Those best fitted to grapple with and to solve the social problems that rose out of the bloody struggle were the people of the South. But in the heat of passion and the flush of victory this idea was spurned by the dominant powers. It could not, or would not, be believed that the Southern people accepted the decision of the sword as honorable, though misguided, men, if any prefer so to regard them. No people in this country, or in the world, knew the negro character so thoroughly, and certainly no people had stronger reasons for treating the negro fairly. However sneeringly the declaration may be received, history shows that no portion of the black race was ever in better circumstances than that portion held in servitude in the Southern States. Those who lived far from the scene had neither the means nor the opportunity for forming correct opinions on the question of slavery. Almost every one knows this, and even ingenuous Northern men, after residing for a time in the South, have candidly confessed that they had never had a true idea of the real condition of our slaves. [illegible] had a young man from central New York to give me the idea of slavery as it had been formed in his mind at home, under the influence of sensational public lectures and books. He had been taught to believe that the slaves were kept in pens like cattle; that at the close of each day's work they were driven in gangs to their pens; food was then thrown over to them as it is thrown to hogs; and in the morning they were marched out to their work, and kept at it till dark at the end of the overseer's lash; and that such was the life of the poor negro, day in and day out, till death mercifully interposed, and freed him from a life of torment. When this man came to live in the South as a teacher, he was of course amazed that this part of his education was based on Munchausen stories.

Many fall into the error of drawing general conclusions from particular premises, and with all such persons special cases of oppression and cruelty are taken as fair samples of a general system. The unfairness of such reasoning is apparent to every thinking person. By such a process any interest may be condemned in which capital and labor are united. We must take the general average working of a system, and draw our conclusions from that, and not from exceptional cases picked out to suit a preconceived theory.

Now in Southern society, while proper distinctions were clearly marked and fully maintained, the best feelings existed between the white and the black race; and there was every natural reason why this should be so. They had grown up together on the same plantation; they had played, hunted, fished, and often worked together, and such strong attachments grew up between them that the negroes took the greatest pride in the families of their old masters, and counted themselves as an important part of the establishment.

The important fact, and one that fully illustrates this last remark, has been overlooked, or, if seen, has been underestimated by many, that the families of the whites were, in multitudes of instances, left to the care and vigilance of the negro servants on the large farms and plantations, while all the white men, except the feeble, old and sick, were in the field as soldiers. Those who were left in their care were almost utterly helpless, and yet not an instance occurred during the war in any part of the South of an insurrection among the negroes. If the system had been as cruel, and the masters as barbarous, as many have thought and asserted, surely there would have been St. Domingo scenes in some parts of the South. We had trained, Christianized, and, to a considerable extent, educated the negroes in our midst and under our rule until they were equal, and, in many respects, superior to the same class in other parts of the world. Let him deny it who will, the history of this country when it comes to be fairly written, will show this, and any history so-called, that ignores it, will be only fiction.

In the very red-heat of the war I have seen negro servants trudging their weary way homeward from Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, and other dreadful fields of death, bearing to the old homestead in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and other States, the swords and other sad mementoes of their slain masters. The whites had no wrath to visit upon the negroes. If we chose to put it upon the mean, low ground of policy, it was to their interest to reach and conciliate them by every possible and proper influence. For they understood the agricultural work of the South, and were the best laborers that could be procured. There was scarcely a generous-minded master in the South that was not ready to say to his slaves: "You have been made free by the war, but here are your homes and here is the land; now, if you will go to work we will make what we can, and divide it fairly." There was a strong sympathy felt for the negro in his then helpless condition, and there is such a sympathy yet. The Southern people certainly had sense enough to see that he must be gradually raised to the position of a citizen, and they would have taken measures to secure this to him with as little friction and disturbance of the social order as possible. Men who are sceptical may pooh, pooh this if they please, but as soon as the shock of defeat passed off, this was the question to which the better class of people in the South began to direct their thoughts, and to help them in solving it they would gladly have received advice from any quarter. They were done fighting, and really wished to reconstruct their shattered social system on a new basis.

But instead of this what had we? Hardly had the echo of the last gun died away before it became plain that a policy was to be adopted with the motto, "To the victors belong the spoils," and with relentless energy this policy was pursued. No time was given the people "to the manner born" to think, to plan, to arrange any thing. The work of reconstruction was taken out of their hands, and put into the hands of a band of adventurers that poured into the South as to a new El Dorado. State governments and Christian churches became alike objects of prey. Why, some of our own people took the scare, and sought shelter from the impending avalanche by "going over." I recall the case of a friend of mine, and a brother minister, who left us sadly, perhaps, but because he felt sure that the only fate before our church was "disintegration and absorption," and this only a matter of time.

The negroes were taken in hand, and thoroughly manipulated. Their heads were filled with crude ideas of citizenship, and the rights it involved. They were alienated from those who were their best friends, and knew best how to develop them into thrifty, industrious and useful citizens. The "forty-acres-and-a-mule" idea was not a joke. They were taught by those who drilled them in "league meetings" that it was to be so. The forty acres were to be cut off the "old plantation" anywhere they wished, and the mule was to be of the best that "old master" had hid away in the hills, and saved from the bummers. To remain with those who had owned them, and to work for money, or a share of the crop, would be to deny their own freedom, and so they left their comfortable cabins, and wandered off to the towns and villages, crowding into the most wretched shanties, and suffering all manner of hardships. The ballot was thrust into their hands, and they were commanded to cast it only for those who sought for places in the South they never could have reached in a century of effort at their native homes, and who used the negro only as a stepping-stone to place and power. It is strange indeed if this foul mistake has not long since been seen and deplored by the more thoughtful people of the higher latitudes of this country.

And is the picture on its ecclesiastical side more pleasing? or, perhaps we ought to ask, is it less repulsive? If the negro could not be left to the care and control of Southern civil rulers, could he remain in connection with and under the guidance of Southern ecclesiastical rulers? Of course not; and hence all the churches we had were invaded, and by appeals which those who did the work know well how to frame and how to present to their hearers, were swept off into other communions. Suppose at the time we had gone before the negroes and tried to persuade them that they ought not to leave us, is there a man living or dead that believes we could have stopped or changed the course of a thousand in a stampede? All we could do was to look on and deplore; we were powerless to avert it. We gave them the best send-off we could at the time, by turning over to them the church-buildings wherever we learned that they were going into another denomination. And these gifts were not small gifts; many of them were churches that cost thousands of dollars, and had been built for them mainly by the liberality of the whites; and this was done at a time (General Conference of 1866), when many of us believed that a reaction would soon set in, and that we should need the churches for our own re-collected flocks, or for an independent Communion of their own under our fostering care. The simple truth is, and it is needless to disguise it, that for years after the war white preachers had hardly any access to the colored people of the South. Naturally inclined, under their new circumstances, to set up for themselves, they were constantly urged to do so by politicians for political reasons, and by religious leaders that came among them for other reasons. In many instances the most ignorant and superstitious among them took the lead as preachers, and the scenes at the meetings held by such bordered upon the wild and fantastic dance-worship of the African tribes in their most savage state.

It is a fact perfectly well known that in the South the negroes are nearly all churched. It would be difficult to find in any community any considerable number not connected with some colored church or congregation. In this state of affairs, if we had a thousand missionaries ready to go among them, and the money to support them, there would be no door of entrance for them. The only thing, and the best thing, we can do for them is just what we have been doing ever since the war closed—not as far as we could, probably, but still to a considerable degree—and that is to help them in all their church-enterprises, and particularly in their educational efforts. And while we do this, let it never be forgotten that many of the best elements in all the Southern negro churches were contributed to them by the white churches that had labored for the blacks so earnestly and successfully previous to the war. This is true especially of the Baptist and Methodist churches, for those had gathered a larger colored membership than any others.

In many respects the negroes have improved since the close of the war. They have become land-holders to an extent not thought of. In all the Southern States there are hundreds of thousands of acres held and worked successfully by them. They have built hundreds of churches, and there is not one, I will venture to say, in which there is not some white man's money. And not only so, it is also a fact that in multitudes of instances white teachers have gone into their Sunday-schools and taught them to read and understand the Scriptures. I know this is the case here in Virginia, and I presume it is so in other States.

We know in the South what the negro needs, and we are ready to supply that need to the fullest extent of our ability, consistent with other obligations.

In the Ecumenical Conference, when this subject was brought up in connection with another germane to it, Rev. David Morton, of Kentucky, said, referring to Rev. J. C. Price's (colored) remarks on the providence which he saw in the whole slavery question, and the training requisite to qualify the American blacks for missionaries to their brethren in Africa: "This training of the Southern negro is not being done as it should be done. There are reasons why it can not be done. We of the Southern States are poor; we are not able to help our friends as we desire to help them. There is not a colored church built in my community of which I dare speak the truth when I say that every Christian white church in the community contributes its mite to the building, and so in regard to every Christian effort and enterprise among them." And like testimony could be gathered all over the South.

The negro is free—we wish him to remain free, and to reach the highest degree of culture his nature is capable of, and as we have the means we ought to help him every way, for he has strong claims upon us. But to charge the Southern Methodist, or any other church, with willful delinquency in regard to strictly missionary work among the negroes, when they were cut off from us and walled in against us, is to make as groundless a charge as is recorded in the annals of the world.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

MISSIONARY.

—The latest news from the American Board's expedition to Bihe, Central Africa, is to the effect that Dr. and Mrs. Nesbit, who were lately sent out, have arrived at Benguela, where Messrs. Bagster and Walter were preparing for their journey into the interior. Messrs. Sanders and Miller were still at Bailundu, where, as will be remembered, the king had stopped them on their journey. They were preparing houses, to live in and for farming operations. Mr. Bagster thinks Bailundu is the best place for the large station. "Thence," he writes, "we can move on the country north of Bailundu, then to the north west part of Bihe, north of the Quito River, Kapobro's country, with its language half Ganguela and half Ambundu; then on into Ganguela and far beyond. We think shall follow the grand highlands up, perhaps, their greatest length inland and shall be on the line of thickest population toward the middle of Africa. The Ganguela language will take us almost across the continent, as we follow the trade of this people." He says the king of Benguela is a tyrant and will not allow the missionaries to travel at will. No carriers dare to start with them unless the king is willing for the white men to go. At present, therefore, it is not practicable to make excursions into the interior, as desired. He says the road to Dondo is open, and traveled by Bailundu men. As soon as possible a journey will be taken to the place and a station established. They will also have in view the opening of a station in the large country between the kingdoms of Bailundu and Dondo. The consul at Loando has offered the missionaries every facility in his power.—New York Independent.

—The Bombay Watchman says: "The present ruler of Abyssinia, King John, has banished all the missionaries who have arrived at Massowah, after a long and painful journey. Under the influence of the bishops and priests of the Church of Abyssinia, he caused diligent search to be made in the houses and huts of the people for copies of the Bible distributed by the missionaries. Whenever a copy of the Scriptures was found, the luckless owners were loaded with chains and cast into prison until their home burned down. The Swedish missionaries had a prosperous work on the eastern frontier of Abyssinia. The London Jewish Mission was working most successfully among the Falashas, or Abyssinia Jews, by native preachers, who were trained in Europe, and had two stations in the northern part of the kingdom. Two German missionaries are engaged in Shoa, the southern part of Abyssinia, under King Menelek's dominion. Now it seems that all these messengers of peace can not do anything on account of the overwhelming warfare and bloodshed of King John, who is really like a tiger."

—The Two Karens, of Burmah, are quite religious, but are not very particular what or who they worship. Some worship, says the Rev. J. T. Elwell, Burmah priests, idols, and pagodas. One man said: "We worship whoever comes along, whether Burmese, Romanist, or Christian. All good. We are sure to be right." Mr. Elwell met a woman suddenly in the jungle, when she jumped aside and exclaimed: "My Lord God." Mr. Elwell immediately set her right. In a backwoods village Mr. Elwell talked to a household about Christianity, when the woman of the house prostrated herself, saying she would worship God and she was scarcely restrained from worshiping the preacher. The people are ready to promise anything, but slow to perform.

—When Bibles and hymn books were allowed the Vaudois in their own valleys, their moderator had to sign an engagement that no one of them should be given to a Romanist. In 1870, when the city of Rome became a part of the kingdom of Italy, among the very front ranks of the soldiers who passed through the gates of Vaudois Colportour entered with a bundle of Bibles. This year the Vaudois have in Italy forty-one organized churches, thirty-four preaching stations, and visit for services one hundred and fifty places. They have thirty-nine pastors and seventy other agents and over three thousand two hundred communicants contributing over $10,500 for the work.

—Although one of the oldest cities in the world, the old Philistine city of Gaza, with a population of 20,000 people, has had no missionary until within three years. The Church of England now has a dispensary there where the poor receive medicines and advice free of charge. Each applicant is required to hear a portion of Scripture read and to carry away a Christian tract in Arabic. Four schools have been opened for Greek and Moslem boys and girls.

—The total cost of every kind for administering $691,245, the American Board's receipts for 1880-81 was, four and three-fourths per cent. distributed as follows: The cost of circulating intelligence, including agencies was two per cent. of correspondence, was one and one-fourth per cent. and of business administration one and one-half per cent.

—The South America Protestant missions, conducted by both American and European societies, are found in the Guianas, in Brazil and the Argentine Republic, in Colombia, Peru, Chili, and to a small extent in Southern Patagonia and Terra del Fuego, as well as in the Falkland Islands.

—A church in Deep Creek, Washington Territory, has a roll of nearly one hundred Spokan Indians. A number of the Umatilla Indians, who are under the care of the Catholics, have expressed a desire to have a Presbyterian Church on their reservation.

—There exists in India special mission societies for the care of lepers. Within a year twenty-eight of these unhappy sufferers have been baptized in several asylums in the north of India—nineteen at one place on a single day in September last.

—Dr. Jessup, of Beirut, Syria, reports that unusual crowds have been attending services in the Greek Church, and that it is the preaching of Mr. Moody's sermons, obtained from the Beirut press, that has caused the great stir.

—Bishop Crowther, Archdeacon Henry Johnston has been visiting the stations in the Niger delta. At St. Stephen's Bonny, he confirmed sixty-seven candidates, and at Nembe the Archdeacon baptized four women, one of them a former priestess to the gods and a great persecutor.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—What is called the "Caxton Brigade" has been started in London by Rev. Charles Bullock. Its object is to sell good and attractive penny publications in place of the "penny dreadfuls." The scheme was at once taken up by a first detachment of twelve boys dressed in appropriate uniforms. As in case of the Shoe-Black Brigade, the scheme is intended to be self-supporting.

—The English Congregational Year-Book for 1882 states that there are 4,397 churches of the order in Great Britain and 899 mission stations. Besides these, there are numerous churches under the care of the London Missionary Society in heathen lands, where there are 92,474 members and 343,708 adherents. The number of churches in London is 230, besides 127 mission rooms.

—An organization, known as the Children's Scriptural Union, was formed in London, England, in April, 1879, and has since spread through different parts of Europe, until now there are about 9,000 branches, comprising nearly 100,000 members. The object is to promote among children and young people the regular daily reading of the Bible.

—The Presbyterian Synod of Virginia has adopted resolutions stating that the South ought to have an increase of fifty licentiates annually, whereas the increase is now only six, and requesting pastors, elders and parents to instruct the conscience of Christian young men in regard to the claims of the ministry.

—There are, it appears, fourteen Lutheran Churches in Philadelphia belonging to the General Council, of which eight are German, besides ten missions, of which six are English. The churches and missions have a total of 8,785 members. The German Churches have parochial schools, with 702 scholars.

—An order has been issued in India that in the future all Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches which have been built by the government shall be repaired and maintained in proper order at the cost of the State, and be treated as State property.

—One of the prominent workers of a large charity school in San Francisco is a son of Dr. Guthrie, of Edinburgh. He is connected with a prominent business firm, and, like his father, is interested in the poor children.

—Rev. Stephen Foreman, a Cherokee Presbyterian preacher, is dead. He was very highly esteemed, and occupied various responsible positions in his nation. He was a missionary for many years of the Southern Presbyterian Church.

—In answer to an inquiry from the Savannah Presbytery, "Can one elder, where there is but one in the church, invite in a minister, and thus constitute a session?" the Presbyterian Assembly (South) returned an affirmative reply.

—The Arkansas Conference of the Union African Methodist Episcopal Church has been united with the Little Rock Conference (Colored) of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It had twenty-five preachers but only 350 members.

—The Reformed Presbyterian Church (Covenanters) has in this country 107 ministers, 122 congregations, 83 pastors. Of the congregations 31 are without regular pastors.

—Bishop Herzog, Old Catholic, has been re-elected pfarrer in Berne by a majority of 273 out of 276. The Roman Catholics abandoned the contest as hopeless.

—The General Conference of the Congregational Methodist Church, a body of about ten thousand members, has just been held in Fredonia, Ga.

—The Scotch Memorial to Dean Stanley is to take the form of a stained glass window in St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh.

—The Southern Methodist Church reports a net gain of 7,620 members in Texas for 1881, the total being 82,170.

—One in every six of our 50,132,866 population is a church member.

THE LITTLE BEGGAR'S BUTTON-HOLE BOUQUET.

'Twas on a bitter winter's day,
I saw a strange, pathetic sight:
The streets were gloomy, cold and gray,
The air with falling snow was white.

A little ragged beggar child
Went running through the cold and storm;
He looked as if he never smiled,
As if he never had been warm.

Sudden, he sped beneath his feet
A faded button-hole bouquet,
Trampled and wet with rain and sleet,
Withered and worthless, there it lay.

He bounded, seized it with delight,
Stood still and shook it free from snow;
Into his coat he pinned it tight,
His eyes lit up with sudden glow.

He sauntered on, all pleased and proud,
His face transformed in every line;
And lingered that the hurrying crowd
Might chance to see that he was fine.

The man who threw the flowers away
Never one-half such pleasure had;
The flowers' best work was done that day
In cheering up that beggar lad.

Ah me, too often we forget,
Happy in these good homes of ours,
How many in this world are yet
Glad even of the withered flowers!

—St. Nicholas.

Bob Ryan and Dandy.

"Never make an enemy, even of a dog," said I to Bobby Ryan, as I caught his raised hand and tried to prevent him from throwing a stick at our neighbor Howard's great Newfoundland. But my words and effort came too late. Over the fence flew the stick, and whack on Dandy's nose it fell. Now Dandy, a great, powerful fellow, was very good-natured, but this proved to be too much for him. He sprang up with an angry growl, bounded over the fence as if he had been light as a bird, caught Bobby Ryan by the arm, and held it tightly enough to let his teeth be felt.

"Dandy! Dandy!" I cried, in momentary alarm, "Let go! Don't bite him!" The dog lifted his dark-brown, angry eyes to mine with intelligence, and I understood what he said—"I only want to frighten the young rascal."

And Bobby was frightened. Dandy held him for a little while, growling savagely, though there was a great deal of make-believe in the growl, and then tossing the arm away, leaped back over the fence and laid down by his kennel.

"You're a very foolish boy, Bobby Ryan," said I, "to pick a quarrel with such a splendid old fellow as that. Suppose you were to fall into the lake some day, and Dandy should happen to be near, and suppose he should happen to remember your bad treatment and refuse to go in after you?"

"Wouldn't care, replied Bobby; "I can swim."

Now it happened, only a week afterward, that Bobby was on the lake in company with an older boy, and that in some way their boat was upset in deep water, not far from the shore, and it also happened that Mr. Howard and his dog Dandy were near, and saw the two boys struggling in the water.

Quick as thought Dandy sprang into the lake and swam rapidly toward Bobby; but, strange to say, after getting close to the lad, he turned and went toward the larger boy, who was struggling in the water and keeping his head above the water with difficulty. Seizing him, Dandy brought him safely to the shore. He then turned and looked toward Bobby, his young tormentor; he had a good many grudges against him, and for some moments seemed to be hesitating whether to save him or let him drown.

"Quick! Dandy!" cried his master, pointing to poor Bobby, who was trying his best to keep afloat. He was not the brave swimmer he had thought himself.

At this the noble dog again bounded into the water and brought Bobby to land. He did not seem to have much heart in the work, however, for he dropped the boy as soon as he reached the shore, and walked away with a stately, indifferent air.

But Bobby, grateful for his rescue, and repenting his former unkindness, made up with Dandy on that day, and they were ever afterward fast friends. He came very near losing his life through unkindness to a dog, and the lesson it gave him will not soon be forgotten.—Children's Hour.

How a Little Girl Suggested the Invention of the Telescope.

Some of the most important discoveries have been made accidentally; and it has happened to more than one inventor, who had long been searching after some new combination or material for carrying out a pet idea, to hit upon the right thing at last by mere chance. A lucky instance of this kind was the discovery of the principle of the telescope.

Nearly three hundred years ago, there was living in the town of Middleburg, on the island of Walcheren, in the Netherlands, a poor optician named Hans Lippersheim. One day, in the year 1608, he was working in his shop, his children helping him in various small ways, or romping about and amusing themselves with the tools and objects lying on his work-bench, when suddenly his little girl exclaimed:

"Oh, papa! See how near the steeple comes!"

Half-startled by this announcement, the honest Hans looked up from his work, curious to know the cause of the child's amazement. Turning toward her, he saw that she was looking through two lenses, one held close to her eye, and the other at arm's length; and, calling his daughter to her side, he noticed that the eye-lens was plano-concave (or flat on one side and hollowed out on the other,) while the one held at a distance was plano-convex (or flat on one side and bulging on the other.) Then, taking the two glasses, he repeated his daughter's experiment, and soon discovered that she had chanced to hold the lenses apart at their exact focus, and this had produced the wonderful effect that she had observed. His quick wit and skilled invention saw in this accident a wonderful discovery. He immediately set about making use of his new knowledge of lenses, and ere long he had fashioned a tube of pasteboard, in which he set the glasses firmly at their exact focus.

This rough tube was the germ of that great instrument the telescope, to which modern science owes so much. And it was on October 22, 1608, that Lippersheim sent to his government three telescopes made by himself, calling them "instruments by means of which to see at a distance."

Not long afterward another man, Jacob Adrinsz, or Metius, of Alkmaar, a town about twenty miles from Amsterdam, claimed to have discovered the principle of the telescope two years earlier than Hans Lippersheim; and it is generally acknowledged that to one of these two men belongs the honor of inventing the instrument. But it seems certain that Hans Lippersheim had never known nor heard of the discovery made by Adrinsz, and so, if Adrinsz had not lived, we still should owe to Hans Lippersheim's quick wit and his little daughter's lucky meddling, one of the most valuable and wonderful of human inventions.—St. Nicholas.

Bits of Natural History.

A naturalist claims that most animals laugh just as well as human beings, only not in the same manner. He also claims that they know how to play practical jokes. Among the instances mentioned in proof of his assertion is that of a certain cat. This cat had an enemy—a dog, of course—and the dog happened to be chained, because he had bitten a man. As soon as the cat saw that the dog was chained, she drew near and began to blink at him. A curious grin spread over her face. As for the dog, he was much cowed, and pretended to look the other way. Then the cat brought a large bone and placed it about one foot from the end of the dog's chain. That was too much for the latter, and he grew furious. The louder the dog barked, the more amused the cat seemed. Having teased her enemy several minutes the cat withdrew, taking the bone with her. The same writer tells a still more laughable instance. A dog owned by a gentleman in Stonington, Ct., knew that his master dreaded snakes. Whenever he would see a snake, he would stop as if alarmed, and "point" in a peculiar manner. One day, he got it into his head that he would play a joke upon his master. Seeing the cast-off skin of a snake, he sprang back and "pointed." The gentleman, in alarm, stumbled over a log of wood, spilled his powder and upset things generally. When he saw what had caused the trouble, he looked at the dog and found him laughing. When a dog laughs, he opens his mouth as widely as possible and, with his tongue hanging out, utters a sound resembling both a bark and a whine. The expression on his face, meanwhile, shows that he is enjoying himself.

Few hunters have such a thrilling experience as that which befell Mr. James Bradley, on the Malay Peninsula, in Asia. Mr. Bradley and two other gentlemen—Mr. Grant and Capt. Lacy—together with several natives, were hunting in a jungle, when a full-grown tiger passed them at a gallop. Mr. Bradley and Mr. Grant fired, but without effect. The tiger stopped, and began to tear bark from a tree with his paws, just as a cat claws the leg of a chair. Mr. Bradley, who was several yards away, fired again, and before he could take the gun from his shoulder, felt himself hurled to the ground, with the tiger standing above him. In another moment the tiger seized him in his jaws and bounded through the jungle. How far Mr. Bradley was dragged he could not say, but it was at least a half-mile; then the tiger stopped, put his victim down, and looked back, listening to the approach of the other hunters, who were following as rapidly as they could. Mr. Bradley quietly gained his all-fours, and tried to creep off, but the brute seized him by the shoulder, and shook him as a cat shakes a mouse. Then the tiger began to dab his paws about Mr. Bradley's face. At that moment a bullet whistled overhead. The hunters were drawing near. Suddenly the beast seemed to be seized with rage. He knew that the hunters were in sight. Just as he seized the poor man Mr. Grant fired, and the bullet entered the tiger's brain. He fell heavily, and Mr. Bradley was saved. Mr. Bradley's life was despaired of for several days, but in a few weeks he was almost as well as ever.

In England, not long ago, some footpads attacked a traveling musician, injured him severely and robbed him of all his money. The musician had several monkeys, all of which were killed except one. That one escaped by climbing a tree. As soon as the robbers had disappeared, the monkey came down the tree and ran to the nearest house. Its antics and cries induced a man to follow him to the spot where the musician was. Afterwards some men were arrested on suspicion of the robbery. The monkey was brought before them. As soon as the little animal saw the men, he began to scream and leap toward them, which convinced the officers that the prisoners were guilty of the crime.

Travelers who went up the Shasta River, in California, last fall, report that there is a wonderful beaver dam at the "Old Meyer ranch." The dam extends across the river, is ten feet high and a quarter of a mile wide. The beavers were very numerous, and appeared to be collecting their food for the approaching winter. The dam probably is the largest one of the kind within the limits of the United States.

Not long ago, a gentleman who lives in the north of London was taking his daily horseback ride, accompanied by his hunting-dog. The horse managed to throw his rider and get away. The dog, upon seeing this, ran after the horse, seized the bridle and held it until his master came up.

The Siamese nation was shocked recently to hear of the death of "his sublime grandeur, the court and body elephant of the king." Such was the official title of the white elephant of the kingdom of Siam. One morning, after a hearty breakfast, the elephant went mad, and trampled five of his attendants. To shoot him would have been considered a great crime, so an attempt was made to place a ring of "holy bamboo" around his body. But the mad beast broke the ring and furiously assailed every object within his reach. The hundreds of people about the court were in a great way. Suddenly the huge animal toppled over and gave his last gasp. The king punished every one about the court severely, as if they were responsible for the antics of "his sublime grandeur."—Golden Days.

FORGIVENESS.—A little boy and girl were playing by the roadside. The boy became angry and struck his playmate a sharp blow on the cheek, whereupon she sat down and began to cry. The boy stood looking on, and presently said—

"I didn't mean to hurt you, Kate; I am sorry."

The little girl's face brightened instantly. The sobs were hushed, and she said—

"Well, if you are sorry, it doesn't hurt me."

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1882.

The time for church fairs and entertainments comes along with the balmy air and flowers of spring. We would caution our Methodist friends especially against all doubtful expedients for raising funds. Beware of juvenile theatricals in the Sunday-school, and of all other devices which tend to inspire the love for unchristian diversions.

Now and then we hear of entertainments given for charitable or religious objects, in which some features are intruded that bring reproach upon the church, and that offend the more conscientious followers of Christ. If some professors of religion, with lax views of duty, or in ignorance of their obligations as Methodists, stray into forbidden paths of sinful diversions, we must insist that such diversions, or anything like them, be kept out of the church. Harmless entertainments are possible, but there is always a risk in them. Worldlings or worldly church members, are apt to assume the direction of these entertainments, and scandal and great harm are the consequence.

We do not question the charitable motives of many excellent people who spend their time and money in providing these church socialies. It is a most unfortunate way of raising money for Christ, and by no means as necessary as some imagine. If, however, it is adopted, we must insist that it be not made a nursery of worldliness. Too much carefulness can not be exercised in regard to this matter. Amateur theatricals, raffles and dancing are not uncommon in fairs and entertainments given under the auspices of some churches. Methodists have need to beware of such corrupting examples.

These entertainments, when conducted with strict propriety, are, at best, no friends to grace. Mr. Moody says that there can be no revivals where church fairs are held. And he is not far from the mark in this matter. They are about the most effectual means that can be fallen upon to drive the Holy Spirit away from the church, and out of the hearts of the people. The young people, and the old also, need to be converted rather than amused. A good revival in any charge is worth more, even financially, than forty sociables. But the main interest is the spirituality of the church, and the salvation of souls. Anything that hinders this work is to be condemned, and to be avoided.

The floods now overflowing the valley of the Mississippi are destroying millions of property, and involving thousand of people in destitution and suffering. Congress has authorized the War Department to expend one hundred thousand dollars in provisions and other supplies for the relief of the sufferers.

We do not know that these great inundations can be entirely prevented, but it is probable that a tithe of the values destroyed, expended in a judicious system of levees and river improvement, would generally insure the country against these terrible disasters.

Much of all this ruin and trouble is due to the negligence and penurious management of the levee system. As several States are interested in the matter, and as they must unite in the work of protection, nothing very effectual is likely to be done. The property owners are not willing to stand the amount of taxation necessary, and it is not easy for the different State authorities to work together harmoniously. It is an affair of national magnitude and interest, and probably there will never be adequate measures taken, until the whole business is given over to the United States government.

It is almost certain that the cost to the country of the present overflow, in money expended for the relief of the destitute, in the destruction of stock and improvements, and the loss of crops, would have sufficed to protect the regions now temporarily ruined. What is done by local authorities, and by individual effort to strengthen the levees, is usually inadequate, and begun too late. Unfortunately the lesson of a great inundation is soon forgotten. The notion is cherished that it will be many years before another comes, and that possibly this is the last that ever will come. And yet, if past experience is worth anything, these deluges are certain to sweep down upon us every few years.

The section overflowed thus far is the richest and most productive cotton land in the world. The water may retire in time for planting, so that a part of a crop may be made, but, at the best, the devastation is immense, and it will be years before the country will recover from the effects of this almost unprecedented calamity. If it shall lead to an effective interstate or national system of protection for the Mississippi valley, good will come out of this present misfortune. The jealousy and competing interests of other sections, and the feuds and conflicts among the politicians, are likely to hinder legislation, but this great valley must ultimately compel what justice has so long in vain demanded. Such an inundation as the present is a national calamity. Besides the thousands of people immediately affected, all classes, and almost all pursuits, will feel it.

Forty days spent in special religious services and devotion may be a good thing for anybody. Even a light diet, an occasional fast, or abstaining from meat now and then, may be wholesome for the bodily health. Lent may therefore be a good thing for the soul and the body. After the carouse and dissipations of the gay season, and the intemperate indulgences of the carnival, it must be restful to enter upon even extra religious duties.

The trouble lies, however, in the notion that these lenten observances, without any genuine repentance or permanent renunciation of the world, the flesh and the devil, do wash off the dust and filth of past excesses; and, so far from restraining, rather open the door of impunity for excesses of riot in the future.

It is in this spirit, and with this conception of the season of Lent, that many enter upon a forty days' course of bodily temperance and extra religious duty. It is a compensation to conscience and to God for the unrestrained frivolities and pleasures of a fashionable season, and a sort of bribe for immunity in days to come. The extreme of worldliness is followed by an extreme of affected and formal austerity. This type of religion is scarcely a blessing to the world, and can be of no saving use to its votaries.

Of course there are consistent self-denying Christians, who are not of the world, and who keep Lent. To such spiritual souls it may be a means of grace, a great comfort, a blessing in many ways.

Advantage is sometimes taken by our pastors, of this lenten pause and lull in worldly diversions, by holding special religious services. The only gain is that there are fewer things to attract the people in the way of popular amusements, and their attention to the gospel is more easily secured. In this way we might improve the lenten season of Roman Catholic and Episcopal Churches, and turn it to some account in the awakening and conversion of souls. The Sabbath is the only Holy Day with us, but all days and all seasons may be improved, as circumstances warrant, for the spread of the truth.

True religion is not a religion of days and festivals, but it incorporates into its habitual life a perpetual unworldliness and spirit of devotion. Its canon of worship is to "pray always," and its rule of conduct is to let our conversation ever be "as becometh the gospel of Christ." The observance of days tends probably to a religion of form rather than power. It is characterized by Paul as "the weak and beggarly elements." He says: "Ye observe days, and months, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."

The best church calendar is that which distinguishes the Sabbath alone from other days. This is in accord with the letter and the spirit of the New Testament, and best for the spirituality of the church. The true believer will, at all seasons, lead a consecrated and holy life, and keep himself unspotted from the world.

The Mormons.

The Mormon question has lately occupied much public attention, and has been extensively discussed. A bill has been passed by the United States Senate for a radical reconstruction of the territorial government of Utah, the provisions of which strip the Mormon element of its political power and influence, and make the enforcement of the law against polygamy practicable and possible. This bill has not yet passed in the House of Representatives, and its fate in that body is doubtful. Political influences, backed by abundant pecuniary resources, may defeat it.

From an article in the New York Independent, by Prof. E. D. Morris, D. D., we gather some interesting and significant items concerning the "Christian elements in the Mormon delusion." He says that the population of Utah is 144,000; the aggregate wealth, $25,000,000; the school system, in which 20,000 children are enrolled, is supported at an annual cost of $142,000, and there is a university—the University of Deseret—sustained, in part, by the territorial Legislature. There are fifteen newspapers. The membership of the Mormon Church is reported at 56,000, the Mormon population at 120,000. The native element in the Mormon population is equal to if not greater than the foreign, and the native element has always been and is now entirely predominant.

Dr. Morris says of the Mormon membership:

> A very large part of it is a contribution from other Churches—notably the various Baptist and Methodist communions in the South, where the Mormon missionaries have of late labored so earnestly and so successfully. Taking all the obtainable facts into consideration, it will be safe to conclude, that as the large majority of the Mormons of foreign birth were, at least, nominally Christians in their own lands, a very large proportion and possibly a considerable majority of the native Mormons, outside of those born within the Church itself, were once members in some Protestant denomination. And it cannot well be questioned that hundreds of those people, both foreign and native, though laboring under this grotesque delusion and though so greatly misled by the hierarchy, are still sincere believers in Christ and his Gospel.

It needs also to be remembered that there are also some Christian elements in the Mormon scheme of doctrine. Public attention is naturally attracted to the strange errors which are found in that scheme, such as the conception of God as having a form like ours, the pre-existence of all souls, the design of the incarnation of these souls in the flesh, the fall of man as a blessing, rather than a curse, the remission of sins in baptism, a continuous revelation in the Church, and an inspired priesthood invested with divine authority. But in the Book of Mormon itself (as might be expected from the fact that it was written chiefly by a Christian minister) there is much that is taken directly from the Bible, as the Decalogue, and the Sermon on the Mount, and other teachings of our Lord. While the Book is not largely doctrinal, but claims rather to be a narrative simply, and is, in fact, a fiction, much of biblical truth was intermingled with such fiction, in order, doubtless, to give it character and weight.

The chief strength of Mormonism is, as Dr. Morris thinks, in this religious element. In it is its greatest vitality. The notion of a continuous revelation through an inspired priesthood he regards, and we think truly, the initial vice and mischief of the whole system. This leaves the way always open for the influx of new errors, and for the crushing out of what Christian truth there is in the system.

The number of polygamous marriages is not as great as we had supposed.

> The number of polygamous marriages is variously estimated from 7,000 to 20,000. If we bear in mind that the whole membership in Utah is but 56,000, and that a considerable proportion of these are young persons, and also that there are in the territory 5,032 more males than females, we may reasonably indulge the hope that the smaller of these figures is much more nearly correct. Twenty thousand such marriages, if such polygamist had but two wives, would make an aggregate larger by several thousands than the entire membership. But, taking human nature as it is, we may presume that, despite unfavorable conditions, such a practice will grow even more rapidly than the organization that permits it, until it involves the Church, the family, the people in one common ruin.

Manifestly, the basis of Mormonism is religious fanaticism rather than lust. Probably there are many hypocrits, especially among the leaders and high dignitaries, but the most of the members of the Mormon Church are sincere. The writer seems to endorse the bill recently passed by the Senate for the suppression of polygamy, but he reminds us that if polygamy be trampled out Mormonism remains.

How to deal with an organization having in it such elements alike of strength and of corruption is a much more complicated, delicate, difficult task than is generally supposed. It is to be a much harder task than most imagine to suppress polygamy by law so long as the people regard it as having divine warrant, and especially so long as the Mormon women regard it as their only safe avenue to blessedness and honor in another life. Let the most rigid legal processes be applied, so far as our Constitution permits; let the polygamous Mormon be excluded from Congress, and from all Federal office in the territory. Let such marriages be treated as illegal wherever any rights of property are involved; let the territorial legislature be dissolved, if need be and the authority of the General Government be every where established as the only guardian of civil order; but let us remember that, after all this, though polygamy were trampled out and Utah were stricken from the map, Mormonism remains.

The idea that Mormonism, as a religion, is to be stamped out by force, or that polygamy among them is to be destroyed, without regard to constitutional and legal process, is justly condemned. He says:

> It may be well, also, to remember that we are bound as Americans to deal with this pernicious system on American principles, and, as Christians, to deal with it on Christian principles. If the Mormons were simply a company of immigrants, drawn together into that distant region by the influence of some common religious error, we could not invoke civil power to prevent their growth, any more than in the case of the Russian Mennonites or of the colonies of German Amish recently settled in the nearer west.

The central problem, and some faint hope of light ahead, are thus stated:

> The existence of an assuming and dangerous hierarchy will not justify us in blotting the Mormon Church out of existence by civil process, while we tolerate a more powerful hierarchy in the Papal communion. And if there be any element remaining in that Church which can properly be called Christian, no one who bears that sacred name could for a moment advocate restorative measures of any sort which are out of harmony with the law of Christ. Here is the most central problem in the case; the most difficult task to perform. After all is secured that either civil power or public sentiment can effect, there will remain a yet higher work for the spiritual Christianity of this land to do. For one, I am not without hope that the better elements in Mormonism may yet assert their force and work out through grace a religious reformation. It is well known that many Mormons do not countenance polygamy, and the time may yet come when this view shall prevail, notwithstanding the pretended revelations in the case. And there may come a time when, with polygamy, other false tenets will be questioned, or when there shall come through the Gospel a division in belief, in which the Mormon organism shall be rent asunder.

The sum of the case would seem to be that polygamy must be put down by law, as best it can be, in accordance with our political institutions; that Mormonism may reform itself, or disintegrate and go to pieces from the operation of internal dissensions; and that the Christian churches must counteract Mormon missionary work abroad, and in Utah, by exposing its errors, and endeavoring to reclaim its ignorant votaries. This is about all there is in the Mormon question, as it presents itself to the American people for practical treatment. The only way that legislation can touch it is in regard to the crime of polygamy. As a religion, the government can not interfere with it. It is a system of religious error and fanaticism, which, as a religion, can be overthrown only by the light and power of the gospel of Christ.

Louisiana Items.

MR. EDITOR: By way of pointed suggestion to the hundreds of Louisiana Methodists who plead poverty as an excuse for not taking the ADVOCATE, I clip the following from the Shreveport Daily Times:

> HOW IT WAS DONE.—Newspapers are so cheap that people have come to regard them as almost without any value at all. There are a great many people who think they cannot "afford" to pay $2 a year for a newspaper—less than four cents a week—and will spend fifty or a hundred times that much for mean whisky. Apropos to this subject the Christian Mirror relates the following to prove how easy it is for a man to pay for his papers:
>
> An editor was sitting in his office one afternoon when a farmer friend of his came in.
>
> "Mr. Editor, I like your paper, but the times are so hard I can't pay for it."
>
> "Is that so, friend Jones? I am very sorry you are so hard up. I will give you my paper."
>
> "Oh, no! I can't take it as a gift."
>
> "Well, then, let me see how we can fix it. You raise chickens I believe?"
>
> "Yes, a few; but they don't bring anything now hardly."
>
> "Don't they? Neither does my paper cost anything. Now I have a proposition to make you. I will continue your paper, and when you go home you may select from your lot one chicken and call her mine. Take good care of her and bring me the proceeds, whether in eggs or chickens and I will call it square."
>
> "All right!" And the farmer chuckled as he went out at what he thought a clever bargain. He kept the contract strictly, and at the end of the year found that he had paid about four prices for his paper. He often tells the joke on himself, and says he has never had the cheek to say he is too poor to take a paper since.

The Red river, and all the streams and bayous in this country, are, as Dr. Mathews would say, "on a boom," and, though yesterday there was reported a fall of four inches at Fulton, it rose here more than that. Some think the worst is over, and, while many places below and above us on the river are under water, or within an inch or two of being, yet it must be that before many days the waters will subside, and permit of plowing and planting to result, after all, in good crops. It does no more good to grumble over the flood than over the drought, or the worms, or the rust, when these come upon us. I have been struck with one thing in reading the papers lately in regard to these floods. It is the value of an inch. A short while back the reports had the river rising one or two or more feet, and yet there was no great concern about it. Why? It was still far below the highest water mark. Now, for some days, an inch rise has become more alarming than one of five feet, six or seven weeks ago. Why? It takes only one inch in many places to fill the banks, to overflow them and flood the lands, possibly drown the cattle and destroy much property. So many a Christian in your city and this is within an inch of an overflow from the Mardi Gras carnival. The invitation to the ball has been sent and received. "Surely there can be no harm in witnessing the tableaux in the opera house or theater." I have never been, and every person should see the wonderful representation at least once in their lifetime. I don't know that I shall dance, and, anyhow, I can not be greatly injured by one night's pleasure. Bro. P. and Sister T. never fail to go. He is a steward, and she is prominent in the Woman's Missionary Society; they are excellent people, and how can I be hurt by going?" The party thus soliloquizing raises not an extra levee by prayer to God for guidance, but goes to the tableaux, stays to the ball, and, dancing or not, comes home in the early morning conscious of self-degradation, and that "the light of life" has been darkened, if not actually put out within him. Sometimes it may be, but such cases, I feel certain, are rare; the flooded soul may rise up from the filthy waters of this tide of sin to a hearty repentance, renewed faith and consistent living. My observation, however, is that the soul that is flooded by the devil's carnival at Mardi Gras goes on afterward as his willing slave. How sensitive and appreciative of an inch are men's souls when the waters threaten their material interests, and how callous and dull to value the step, the inch that brings the sea of iniquity in upon them, to the ruin of every spiritual interest. How ought our pulpits to sound forth no mincing denunciation of this foreign deviltry, but, in strongest terms, denounce it, and warn church members against soiling their garments and risking their souls. Candidly, Mr. Editor, ought not pastors, in all kindness to their flocks, an leaning on God, to enforce Discipline in regard to these things?

J. T. SAWYER.

The Theater Arraigned.

We commend the following to the dispassionate and conscientious attention of our readers, especially to those who sometimes patronize the theater. The Chicago theater is certainly not worse than the theater in New Orleans and most other large cities. The article is by Dr. Herrick Johnson, in the Inter-Ocean:

> But are there no clean plays? Yes; there are clean plays and clean players; but they are like Gratiano's "two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff." Plays must be sensational to be effective, must be a representation of active passions to be popular. There is a whole class of plays that turn on criminal passion between the sexes, while murder, abduction, marital infidelity, injured honor and revenge abound in the drama. Even "Pendragon" hinges on adultery, and, pure as the character of Arthur is, it must have forsooth the foil of his wife's shame and dishonor. So the proof of Arthur's most honored knight's guilt is found in the woods, and the knight himself is caught in Arthur's wife's bed-room. Adultery is bad enough on trial before a court, where it is necessarily arraigned for punishment. But it is immeasurably worse in its demoralizing effects set forth on the stage, where the story of the iniquity is often told with voluptuous heat of illicit love and amidst thrill of music and gorgeous scenic surrounding.
>
> This is no new thing. Ever since Euripides play-writers have delighted in the representation of criminal and unnatural passions. It is true, villainy is commonly punished in these plays; but the villainy is often given such dash and daring and bravado, and is so set round with attractions, and is pursued with such utter abandon and intoxication of delight, that many a youth is led to prefer the way to destruction and the devil, because the journey can be made in such a blaze of glory. Take "Led Astray," for example, and, though the crime is followed by the penalty, the whole tone and coloring show that "the treatment is that of a hater of the penalty, and not that of a hater of the crime."
>
> Christians of Chicago, moral men and women, lovers of clean homes and pure, sweet lives, what do you think of all this? Look at the record! Face the facts and judge ye!
>
> I charge that the theater is often a murderous assault upon all that the family circle holds most holy and sacred."
>
> I charge that it strips young women of their ordinary attire, and exhibits them to the public gaze, so clad that to the eye of the audience they seem and are meant to seem almost naked! You do not need to be told why that is done.
>
> I charge that the shafts of wit flowing across the stage are often feathered from very obscene fowl.
>
> I charge that the theater is the channel through which the filth and pollution of lewd and lascivious play-writers is poured into the minds of young men and young women, thus poisoning the very springs of our social life.
>
> I charge that the great mass of what has been put upon the boards of Chicago's theaters the last year has been trash of the most unadulterated description, often passing into the realm of the filthy and the vicious; and off the hand-bills of the theaters, and out of the mouths of theatrical press-writers, I have brought the proof that these charges are true.
>
> What if it be also true that this dark programme of the theater is padded here and there with the so-called standard drama, to win the countenance and patronage of the most respectable and decent? I do not need to be told that to some extent it wins them; but neither do you need to be told, moral and Christian men and women of Chicago, thus drawn to see an exceptional play of high and chaste form and tone, that you are duped and paraded as friends and supporters of the establishment—an establishment three-fourths or nine-tenths of whose influence is pernicious and poisonous. Your patronage goes to swell the receipts of and to give countenance to the house whose common and most characteristic features are an offense to purity, to religion and to God.
>
> Now and then is heard a cry of reform; but a radical, permanent reformation of the theater is a phantasm, a dream. The ideal stage is out of the question. Just as pure, chaste, public human nudity is out of the question—i. e., with men and women as they are now constituted—the nature of theatrical performances, the essential demands of the stage, the character of the plays, and the constitution of human nature, make it impossible that the theater should exist save under a law of degeneracy. Its trend is downward; its centuries of history tell just this one story.
> The actual stage of this city is a moral abomination. It is trampling on the Sabbath with defiant scoff. It is defiling our youth. It is making crowds familiar with the play of criminal passions. It is exhibiting woman with such approaches to nakedness as can have no other design than to breed lust behind the on-looking eyes. It is furnishing candidates for the brothel. It is getting us used to scenes that rival the voluptuous and lecntious ages of the past. Go to Naples, and look on the gathered proofs of Pompeii's profligacy and lust if you would see whither we are swiftly tending. It is a startling question asked by one of the theatrical play-writers of the time: "To what extent will a continued progress in the same direction take us in the next twenty-five years?" To what extent, indeed! Good citizens, is it not full time we caught the alarm at these assaults on decency with which now the very streets are placarded? Is it not full time for every respectable man and woman to withhold countenance of the unclean thing, and to enter indignant protest against its gross immoralities?

The Roman Catholics are no friends to the public schools. Archbishop Perche, of New Orleans, in a recent pastoral letter to the clergy and faithful of the diocese, refers to the public schools in terms of unmistakable condemnation. This is the attitude of Roman Catholic authorities everywhere. They approve of Catholic schools only. Archbishop Perche, in his pastoral letter, says:

> We cannot however, refrain from addressing to the Catholics of this diocese which is so dear to us, a few words of exhortation and encouragement, especially on a subject that has always claimed our anxious care—the education of our children.
>
> The Catholic education of our children is the necessary condition to prepare them for a seriously Christian life and to perseverance amid the seductions and dangers of the world. Now we have often reminded you that the Christian education of our children requires the concurrence of three co-operators; the priest, who has a special grace to instruct in catechism, the teacher in the school-room and the parents at home. Catholic parents should send their children to the parish schools, which happily exist in many parishes, or at least to schools kept by Catholic teachers.
>
> With regard to catechism it is to be desired that the children should attend the instructions given in their respective parishes, so that they become early acquainted with their pastors and their pastors with them, and grow accustomed to the church which they shall have to frequent habitually.
>
> Children, who through the fault of their Catholic parents, attend the public schools should not, on this account be rejected, since they are not responsible for the fault of their parents, but rather this should be an additional reason to attract and win them to God by kindness and charity, and to guide them to the good way with that gentleness and mildness which are the distinctive characteristics of the priest according to the spirit of Jesus Christ.

An Earnest Appeal.

To the preachers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the Board of Missions, earnestly desirous to continue and carry forward without interruption or embarrassment the work which has been committed to it, makes appeal.

Very urgent demands are made upon the Treasury of the Board, to which early response must be made upon peril of forfeiting advantages gained, and sacrificing interests dear to the Church. It would be no difficult matter to lay before you the special requirements in behalf of which we call upon you; but the statement in detail at this time would be wearisome, and perhaps only deter you from giving attention to this notice. It will suffice to speak in reference to one class of interests involved.

The entire amount appropriated for building uses in all our foreign missions, at the last annual meeting in May, 1881, was held subject to the order of the Board, from time to time, as the conditions of the treasury should indicate the propriety and safety of drawing upon it. Without this fund Dr. Patterson will be compelled to abandon work projected in his rapidly extending field in Mexico, and, indeed, will find himself under serious embarrassment in the maintenance of work begun and well advanced; Dr. Allen will be hindered, and the progress of his work in China grievously afflicted; the enterprise in Brazil must be stayed at a critical moment. The effect of all this upon the missionary enterprise of the Church will be serious and far-reaching.

Other fields are opening to us to which we are imperatively called, and yet will not dare to enter unless we can command a larger interest and a higher measure of liberality in the Church.

With these things in view we make our appeal upon two points: First. We call your attention to the fact that, while the system of appropriations upon which our work now proceeds was made at the last annual meeting in May, 1881, the assessments corresponding thereto were not made upon the annual conferences until their next ensuing sessions; the effect of which is to throw us back upon collections made on the basis of the assessments of May, 1880, and which as yet are not all reported. Thus, upon the narrower estimate of 1880 we are compelled to carry forward the larger plans in 1881. In order to meet this difficulty it is necessary that collections on the last assessment of 1881 be taken at the earliest possible day, and remitted to the treasury.

We therefore earnestly request all our preachers to make collections without delay, and remit to the Treasurer, J. W. Manier, Nashville, Tenn., not later than May 1, at least one-half the amount assessed to their respective charges. This will enable the Board, without borrowing at high rates, to meet the claims of our missions.

Second. In view of the daily increase of the work wherein the Church has sent her representatives, we invoke an enlarged liberality upon the part of our members. Give heed, brethren, to these calls of the Lord, and let not his cause suffer for want of the means with which he has so largely blessed you for these uses.

May you prosper as those who love his Church.

A. W. WILSON,
Sec. B'd of Missions.

WAS IT THE FIRST TIME?—"C.," writing in the New York Christian Advocate of Bishop Peck at New Orleans, says:

But perhaps the most remarkable service of the day was the one held at night in Carondelet Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The pastor of this church, the Rev. Felix Hill, invited the Bishop to preach for him, and at the same time asked the pastor of Ames' Methodist Episcopal Church and his congregation to join in a union service. The devotional exercises on this occasion were conducted by Dr. Hill and W. C. Webb, and Bishop Peck preached an earnest and eloquent sermon from 1 Cor. iv, 20: "For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." The effect of the sermon was wonderful. Responses came from all parts of the church, and it was evident that the large congregation was both pleased and profited by the Bishop's discourse. There was this peculiarity about the occasion—it was the first time that a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church had preached in a pulpit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in New Orleans. There can be no doubt that the result of this service will be to draw the members of the two churches closer together in the bonds of true fraternity.

The occasion referred to by C. was a very agreeable one, but he may be in error in stating that "it was the first time that a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church had preached in a pulpit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in New Orleans." Our Northern brethren invoked the military power not many years ago, and by that authority took possession and occupied our churches in New Orleans for some time, and among them this very church in which Bishop Peck was invited to preach. They seemed disposed to hold on to these churches and did so until President Johnson compelled them to give them up. The "Stanton-Ames order" must always be connected with the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church. We do not know, as a matter of fact, that Bishop Ames, who was mainly instrumental in seizing our churches, ever preached in any of them. Dr. Newman can testify on that point. It may be that no Northern bishop ever did preach in them until Bishop Peck's recent visit. Be this as it may, we rejoice in fraternity, and greatly enjoyed Bishop Peck's lecture, though we did not hear his sermon.

OUR MEXICAN MISSIONARIES.—After further reflection Dr. Patterson, whose arrival from Mexico was noticed last week, concluded to proceed at once to Tennessee, and to make another visit to New Orleans some time in April. Accordingly he left with his family Thursday evening, February 23, for Memphis. He expects to be present at the session of the Baltimore Conference at Fredericksburg, March 8. On Thursday morning, the day of his departure, Dr. Patterson met an impromptu gathering at the Carondelet Street Church, and gave a most interesting account of our mission work in Mexico. The outlook there is most encouraging. Our Church there has 1150 members, six hundred children in Sunday-schools, thirty-five preachers, six church edifices and sixty preaching appointments. There are twenty-three day-schools and 530 pupils connected with the mission, a school for training and instructing the preachers, and a mission press on which two monthly papers—one for the children—are printed and also tracts for general distribution. Dr. Patterson exhibited samples of hymn books printed in the mission press, and the work is certainly not excelled by our presses at Nashville. Sister Patterson and her little daughter Bessie, with the cabinet organ accompaniment, gave us a specimen of singing in Spanish. This was a most delightful feature of the occasion. Methodism is evidently at home in Spanish, as it is in every tongue, and every where.

A brother, sending us a notice of his marriage and a year's subscription to the ADVOCATE, says:

DEAR ADVOCATE—Being no longer a transient man, I think you may count me as a permanent subscriber to your precious columns, which will be gladly received into my little home and carefully perused. May the Lord bless and prosper you in all of your efforts to do good.

We heartily congratulate our friend on his double blessedness, and, in view of his taking the ADVOCATE, on his threefold blessedness. Let all young married people go and do likewise. Let them take the ADVOCATE, and read it, if they would prosper. A religious paper is a necessity in all well ordered homes.

—The Secretary of War is ordering supplies to different points for distribution among the sufferers from the overflow. From latest accounts the upper Mississippi and the Ohio rivers are falling. There is some hope that the worst is over, but the rains have been incessant and heavy here for several days, and the levees, at many points on the lower Mississippi, are in a precarious condition. Considerable anxiety has been felt in New Orleans, as the levee in the neighborhood of Carrollton is reported as almost ready to break. A large force has, we understand, been at work there night and day, and it may be tolerably secure now. A few thousand dollars expended in September would have averted this peril, and possibly in the end have saved millions of dollars. Such is the management, or mismanagement, of public affairs!

—We publish on our third page this week a masterly article from the Nashville Christian Advocate by Dr. Bennett, president of Randolph-Macon College, on Southern Methodism and the negro. It is in harmony with what we have said on this subject, only it is more in detail and every way better. The truth of this matter ought to be stated, and our people ought to be informed. Let us by all means do what we can for the negro while we vindicate the church from unmerited condemnation.

—We regret to learn that Rev. T. H. McClendon, presiding elder of the Shreveport District, Louisiana Conference, will probably be compelled to retire from the district on account of ill health. We hope and pray that Bro. McClendon may be speedily restored and that he may be able to continue on the district.

—We are gratified to learn by a private note from Rev. W. H. Leith that his wife's health has greatly improved since their removal from Mississippi to East Tennessee. Bro. Leith sends us an interesting letter for publication which will appear next week.

From North Louisiana.

Rev. J. A. Parker, writing from Homer, La., February 16, says:

Rains almost incessant since the first of January. Roads nearly impassable—waters very high—business in the towns almost suspended. Bradley was eight days on the road with the dear wife and little ones in the rain, mud and snow. Brown was four or five days logging down, swimming creeks and caring for his little ones on the road, and twice stopped and forced into quarters by the weather. Miller, Stone and the writer hereof were permitted to stay at home during the bad weather. Small pox is reported all around, but no case in sight yet. The country physicians seem quite slow in procuring vaccine for their patrons and if a case or two should appear the disease would have "free course" and a clear field.

On the circuits, as in the fields, very little is being done and but little can be done anywhere till the weather clears up a little. I am just from Minden, La., and found it almost impossible to go alone behind a pair of good horses and on a light buggy.

Can Women Sign?

MR. EDITOR: We have been written to by parties to know if it is proper for ladies to sign the petition to the Legislature to propose amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the whisky traffic.

We reply, women are important factors in this government, and though not allowed a vote they are the sufferers and ought, by all means, to be permitted to express their sentiment by signing this petition.

JOHN PITES.

MARSHALL, La., Feb. 21, 1882.

L. J. G., writing from Morgan City, La., February 22, says:

The "Ladies' Aid Society" of Morgan City, under the auspices of the Methodist Church, held an entertainment in Whitney Hall, on the 15 16 17 instant; the proceeds of which was to be used to clothe and educate the poor and indigent of this city. Our citizens will be pleased to learn that this enterprise was a complete success. The total sum received above all expenses amounting to $140.

TO OUR AGENTS.—The publisher would be greatly obliged if all agents would remit promptly collections for subscriptions, or, at least once a month, send amount on hand with names from whom collected. It is hoped that extra efforts will be made this year to secure a large number of new subscribers, and as the General Conference will meet in May the paper will be unusually interesting and of great value to every member of the Church.

Personal and Other.

—The so-called gold axe of King Kollog, of Ashuntoo, recently sent to Queen Victoria, has been deposited, at the Queen's order, in the museum at South Kensington. It is not a beautiful thing to look upon, nor is there so much gold about it as its name would imply. The blade was apparently cut originally from a piece of boiler iron, and is roughly fashioned, with a clumsy handle of oak which is covered with leopard skins and badly stained, apparently with blood. Around the handle are bands of thin gold, badly hammered into ornamental relief. A piece of tiger skin forms the blade a sheath, attached to which is an object hanlon from gold and shaped like a cockle shell.

—Burns never composed a lyric without first crooning a melody to himself, in order to kindle his emotion, and regulate the rhythm of his words. Sometimes he got an old woman to hum the tune to him; sometimes the village musician to scrape it on his fiddle, or a piper to drone it on his lag-pipe; oftimes his own wife sang it aloud to him, with her wood-note wild. And so his songs are not, like many modern ones, set to music; they are themselves music, conceived in an atmosphere of music, rising out of it, and with music instinct to their last syllable.—Principal Shairp.

—It is proposed to erect at Zurich a statue of Zwingle, the reformer. Sculptors of all nations have been invited to compete for the work, the cost of which is not to exceed 80,000f. In a Zurich churchyard, the use of which has been abandoned, have just been exhumed the remains of Lavater, which were then reinterred in St. Peter's square.

—Gov. John P. St. John, the temperance-loving governor of Kansas, is of rather short stature. He wears a heavy moustache and his keen eyes are set deep under bushy eye-brows. In conversation he is earnest and he has a modest western manner; but when he speaks from the platform people feel they are in the presence of an orator.

—There is still living a lineal descendant of Martin Luther in the person of one Herr W. Wolters, of Stuttgart. He was formerly a court actor and claims descent through Luther's daughter Anna. The male line has long been extinct, the last representative of it having died in 1720. This was Prof. Luther, of Leipsic.

—Spurgeon in noticing Dr. Parker's "Ingersoll Answered," says:

We neither care for Ingersoll nor the answer to him. There is enough to do in England with cutting up our own brambles; nine out of ten know nothing of this American briar, and there is no need they should.

—People of Lewiston, Idaho, tell with some emotion the story of Eagle, an old Nez Perce Indian, who, having the small-pox, and being deserted by his tribe, calmly dug his own grave, lay down in it and died.

Books and Periodicals.

THE MINISTRY OF HEALING, or Miracles of cure in all ages. By A. J. Gordon, pastor of Clarendon Street Church, Boston. Boston: Howard Gilmore.

The author believes that miracles have not ceased, and that they may still be wrought by faith. He believes that supernatural healing of the sick still occurs, and that the church may in its members still possess and exercise the gift. The testimony of Scripture, of reason, of the church, of theologians, of missions, of the adversary, of experience, and of the healed is adduced. Here is an open door for fanaticism. We would not exclude the supernatural from the physical world, nor would we doubt that the prayer of faith is often the means of healing the sick, but have believers in this age power to work miracles? The moral miracle is greater than the physical—and this, as exhibited in the conversion of sinners, is the highest attestation of the truth of the gospel.

THE HALL IN THE GROVE. By Pansy. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

Pansy is one of the writers whose books are always entertaining and edifying. This work is chiefly about Chautauqua and the remarkable educational movement connected with it. The publishers say: "Fully half the book is taken up with a vivid description of life at Chautauqua during the summer season, and many real characters are introduced which give a strong feeling of reality to the whole story. Dr. Vincent, Dr. Meredith of this city, George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia, known for his work as connected with the Christian Commission during the war, Gen. Fisk, and others whose names are 'household words' throughout the length and breadth of the land, take active part in its pages." 12mo, 431 pages, cloth binding, price $1 75.

THE PAPAL POWER IN POLITICS; or Bulls against liberty, by Rev. B. F. Tefft, of the Louisville Conference, Owensboro, Ky. For sale at the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, Tenn. Price $1.

The author in separate chapters treats of: Infallibility of the Pope; The Temporal Sovereignty of the Pope; The Encyclical Letter of Pope Pius IX; The Syllabus of Errors Condemned by Pope Pius IX; The Roman Catholic Church and the Public schools; The Papal Power in prophecy. It is a good book to read and circulate. Protestants need to be informed on the subject of Roman Catholicism, and to keep on the watch against the insidious enemy of civil liberty.

THE WOMANHOOD. Hints on the formation of Womanly Character. By Rev. Frank Hir Johnson, D. D. Cambridge, Mass. Moses King.

The volume contains a series of sermons or lectures on the topic described in the title. The author treats of Character Building; Character and Reputation; Selfishness; The Love of Home; Duty; The Government of the Affections; Purpose; The Masculine Woman; Little Faults; Piety. It is a well written book, judicious, instructive, and worthy the study of the men and women of the time.

THE USE OF TOBACCO, by J. T. D. Hinds, Ph. D.; printed for the author by the Cumberland Presbyterian Publishing House, Lebanon, Tenn. Price 75 cents.

The author treats of tobacco comprehensively, tells its history, its botanical description, chemical analysis, physiological action, cultivation, production, adulterations. The users of the weed, specially young users of it, will do well to read the book. The author gives no quarter to the vile stuff and those who indulge in its use.

THE CLASS OF '76. By Helena V. Morrison. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. Price $1 25.

A bright and attractive story in which the author shows the weakness of some of the methods employed by temperance workers, and combats the arguments of a certain class of the opposers of the temperance movement. Lukewarm Christians and derelict preachers receive some pungent blows.

THE ENGLAND OF SHAKESPEARE. By E. Goadby. Cassell, Peller, Galpin & Co., New York.

The work is a description of the times of Shakespeare, the underlying idea being that the mind and genius of Shakespeare were rooted in the age and circumstances in which the great poet lived.

THE WIT AND WISDOM OF THE BENCH AND BAR. By Hon. F. C. Moncrieff. Cassell, Peller, Galpin & Co., New York.

It is of the English Bar that the author writes. A very entertaining work.

BEPPIE.—May I confer a favor upon your readers by calling their attention to Beppie, by Miss E. T. Dissosway, author of Marguerite, etc.?

Beppie is a story illustrative of the times of the introduction of Methodism into Virginia. Its merits are these: 1. It is not sectarian; 2. It is not sectional; 3. It throws light on an interesting part of American history; 4. Its literary style is superior to that of most of our Sunday-school books; 5. It is interesting from beginning to end; 6. It rebukes bigotry and formalism and exalts spiritual Christianity. The little book is worthy of a place in every Sunday-school and home in the land. Published by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, Tenn.

The difference is mighty, indeed;

Governor Vance, of North Carolina, was in Philadelphia the other day, and while there met in the person of a hotel-waiter a Negro, advanced to middle age, whom he had known down South. He made a few pleasant remarks to the colored man, and got led into twitting him about religious matters, on which the darkey spoke with some fervor. "Well, now, Joe," said the Governor, "do you really believe in this election by God, that you speak of?" "Deed I do, Massa Vance," said the Negro, seriously, with a shake of the head. "Well do you think I am elected to be saved?" "Scasely know, Massa Vance, but I nebber heerd of any one being 'lected what wasn't a canderdate."

A correspondent writes and asks if it is healthy to eat nights. We can't tell him. We never ate a night, nor do we know now anyone who has any more experience than we have. We should imagine, however, that ordinarily such food would not be what might be called "light food," yet of the same time, we think a man would have to eat a very large hole into a dark night before he would be weighed down with oversafety.

Beneficent nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Laplace's Iodine Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

The Rev. Dr. McCosh, of Princeton College, tells a story of a Negro who prayed earnestly that he and his colored brethern might be preserved from their upsetting sins. "Brudder," said one of his friends, at the close of the meeting, "you ain't got de long ole dat ar word. It's howetin', not upsettin'." "Brudder," replied the other, "if that's so, it's so; but I was prayin' de Lord to save us from de sin ob toxication, in' of dat ain't an upsettin' sin I dunno what am."

It is one of the unexplainable things of moral ethics how people decide so promptly as to how little rain and bad weather it takes to keep them away from prayer-meeting and how much is required to keep them away from a good show.

ONIONS FROM SEED.—It is of great advantage to sow onion seed early, and the best way to insure it is to do all that can be done in the fall to make the soil ready; for, if left until spring, it will take longer to dry than if it is left light and loose in the fall, and then there is not only the time required for its preparation, but very probably considerable delay by frequent storms at that season. In order to bulb well, onions should have all the chance possible to make their early growth while the ground is cool. Seed sown late, when the mean daily temperature is already high and increasing, may vegetate promptly, but the young plants make a very spindling growth and never produce as good bottoms. Old onion-growers understand all this and do not need to be reminded of the importance of the early preliminary work.

Good onion crops can be produced on a variety of soils, from sandy loams to clayey loams and alluvial bottom-lands, containing a large amount of carbonaceous substance of vegetable mold. Soils of the latter character are probably best, but the land must be well drained. This last remark is true of all land on which onion culture is to be undertaken; but it is not so frequently necessary on rolling uplands to underdrain as on the lower-lying bottom-lands. Good crops are often secured on such lands by a system of draining with open ditches. Generally it may be considered that this method is more expensive ultimately than substantial underdraining; but there are localties where it can be adopted to advantage. On most clayey loams underdraining may be considered absolutely essential to secure the best crops of onions, and this preparation should be made with full confidence that the expense will soon be repaid in extra crops. A good sandy loam is a very desirable soil for onions, and good crops may be raised on quite sandy soils, with proper management and manuring. Level ground is more desirable than that having much slope, as on the latter the washings by heavy rains would be injurious. Land should be selected, if possible, that has just been in some hoed crop, and that has thereby been left free from weeds.

Deep plowing and harrowing the surface until fine are operations essential to a good crop. It is well to delay the fall plowing as late as possible; but it should be done when the ground is dry and the ground can be left in rough furrows all winter. Old or well-rotted stable-manure should be used at the rate of twenty cords to the acre on most soils. Fresh manure should be carefully avoided, as it contains many weed-seeds, which would immediately germinate, and, consequently, cause much extra work in weeding, after the crop is up.

When barn-yard manure of sufficient quantity or of proper quality can not be procured, artificial fertilizers may be used. Of these Peruvian guano and bone-dust can probably be used to best advantage, and should be applied in the spring and worked in during the course of pulverization. Ashes are sometimes used at the rate of one hundred to two hundred bushels to the acre. It is generally agreed by experienced onion-growers that mellowing the soil deeply is a disadvantage, rather than a benefit, as in that case the roots strike deep and the onions do not form good bulbs, many of them being what are called bull-necks, or scallions; consequently, if the cultivator is used in working the soil, it should be set so as to run more than about five inches deep, and on light soils the use of the harrow will be all that is necessary. This work should be done as early in spring as the ground is dry enough to work. It requires about three weeks for onion seed to germinate, and it should be got in with the least delay possible. Having the soil in proper condition, fine and mellow, the seed can be sown very rapidly with a good seed-drill. It should be in rows about twelve inches apart. If the seed is to be sowed by hand, a line should be used, to keep the rows straight. Draw a drill by the side of the line, about half an inch deep, and drop the seed as evenly as possible, about a quarter to a half inch apart, and then cover by drawing a little soil over or by spreading sand along the drill. Another way of sowing is sometimes practiced, and is thought to facilitate weeding and hoeing the crop. This is by distributing the seed in little clusters or circles, about six inches in diameter, keeping the centers twelve inches apart each way. However, drilling in continuous rows is the generally accepted method. If all the work of cleaning and cultivating were to be done by hand and hoe, the cluster or hill method might present advantages; but with wheel-hoes and hand-cultivators there is none. The implements referred to are now offered in forms so improved and perfected and are such valuable aids in cultivation that no one having much work to perform, of the kind to which they are adapted can afford to be without them.

Onion seed is a crop of considerable uncertainty to raise, and the amount of it produced from year to year is quite variable. As it is poor seed to keep, retaining its vitality but a short time, the price of it is subject to great fluctuations. It may be offered one season at a dollar or a dollar and a half a pound, and the very next spring be worth from four to five dollars. A little reflection will enable our readers to perceive that there is no safety in turning aside, in time of scarcity, from respectable dealers, who have a reputation to maintain, in order to buy onion seed at a low price. No one can afford to carry his stock over at any time, on account of its poor-keeping qualities, and, if it is unusually valuable, the necessity is there for him to sell. To fix an exorbitant price, therefore, and to maintain it would be practically impossible. On the other hand, the temptation is very great at such times for irresponsible parties to pour into the market old seed at a comparatively low price. One can not afford to take any risks in purchasing onion seed as the expense of propagation and the value of the prospective crop are too great to admit of any avoidable chances.

The staple varieties for general crops are the Wethersfield Red, and the Danvers Yellow. Particular markets may demand white varieties to some extent, when White Globe can be raised for the main crop and the Silver-skinned for very early use.

As soon as the young plants are fairly up, cultivating and weeding should commence, and be persistently continued until the crop is out of danger. A delay of a few days in weeding may result in the loss of a great portion of the crop. If any appearance of wilting or turning yellow of the plants is noticed, immediate inspection of them must be made, for this indicates the work of the onion maggot, which sometimes does considerable damage. The onion-fly (Anthomyia ceparum) lays its eggs on the onion, and the larvæ when hatched gnaw into the center of the little onions and destroy them. All affected plants should be pulled up and burned. Soot is the best [illegible] that can be applied to prevent the work of the insect, and next to this is powdered charcoal. Lime, salt, and ashes will all do good.—Vick's Magazine.

THE FOLLY OF FARMING TOO MUCH LAND.—Many sermons have been preached to farmers upon this fruitful topic. Books have been written to show the good sense of having "small farms well tilled." One man entitled his book "Ten Acres Enough," and still another, we believe, "Five Acres Too Much." But if one will travel through many of the farming regions of the West he can not fail to see that most farmers are trying to till too much land. Many corn-fields are thickly matted with weeds and foxtail grass, while that "nuisance of nuisances," the cocklehurr, is literally "taking" whole fields. Where such a state of things exist it is too true that the owner is "scalling it" over too much land! But we intend no sermonizing over this subject at this time, but merely to give the experience of one of the solid farmers of Iowa in keeping "Five Cows on Five Acres." The writer, Mr. S. G. Davenmore, a most intelligent gentleman, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, relates his experience in the last Iowa Homestead.

I have five acres, about two and three-fourths in pasture, mostly blue grass.

I have a strip fourteen rods long and four rods wide, that consist of timothy and clover, which I cut twice, and sometimes three times a season. As soon as it will do to cut I feed it regularly to the cows twice each day, and it lasts until the corn is ready to use. There is a strip fourteen rods long and ten rods wide, which I plant with sweet corn for fodder. I made a dropper that I attach to a two-horse planter, which makes the stalks about two inches apart in the row. I plant at three different times, so as to have it early and late. About the first of July I commence to thin it out, leaving a stalk about once in a foot. By the time I get over, the piece that is left is nearly eared out. Then I commence cutting it up clean. When I get it half cut up I plow the ground and sow winter rye. I sow the balance as soon as the corn is off. This makes good pasture late in the fall and early in the spring.

We feed our cow six quarts of corn meal and bran, mixed equal parts by weight each day. This is the way I summer five cows on five acres, and have done so for three years past. I have four Jersey cows and one Guernsey. I have raised five calves and have made 1,300 pounds of butter each year, after using cream and milk for a family of four during that time. I manure the ground high, and that is what makes good crops. The first planting of corn this season is about eight feet high, and the last about two and one-half feet, and growing at the rate of four inches daily.—St. Louis Journal of Agriculture.

THE HORSE IN HARNESS.—A few hints may be acceptable to persons not used to putting the horse in harness, as follows:

1. The collar should fit neatly. If it is large and loose, permitting the passage of one's arm between it and the neck, it is unsuited for the horse to work in. Then, in addition to fitting as nicely as a lady's glove, it should be soft and supple—with these conditions perfect no fears of gall need be entertained.

2. The hames should exactly fit the collar. A common error is to have them too wide apart at the top. Another common error is to have the staples holding the hooks to which are attached the traces too high. No horse can draw well when the traces are so attached as to bring a strong pressure upon the back of his neck.

3. When moving the horse from the cart to the plough do not, as is a common practice, neglect to change the backband, which being too short for the plough will, most likely, gall the back.

4. Horses with tender skin and liable to gall despite all precautions taken should have exposed parts bathed daily in an ooze made by boiling white oak bark. It will have a tendency to soon toughen the skin.

5. Remember, always, that a little care in preventing an ill is cheaper and better than much labor expended in an attempt to cure it.

ROTATION OF CROPS.—In a well planned system of farming, the subject of crop rotations should be carefully considered, as one of the essential elements of success in its highest and best sense. It seems to be the prevailing opinion that the alternation of crops, in systematic order, is a modern invention that was gradually developed as a direct result of the applications of science to the art of agriculture. The early writers on agriculture, even from the times of the Greeks and Romans, have, however, quite uniformly urged the teachings of experience. They were satisfied that a variety of crops grown in succession, all other conditions being equal, would give a greater aggregate yield than could otherwise be obtained. The reasons for the success of the system could not, it is true, be given, but practical men were fully agreed in urging its importance, and many systems of rotation, more or less perfect, were planned, some of which became the prevailing rule of farm practice in particular localties. That these practical rules of alternating crops of different habits and modes of growth are based on correct, but not fully explained, principles, has been shown by direct experiment.—American Agriculturist.

PASTURING ORCHARDS.—An exchange gives the following statement of an orchard successfully pastured by sheep and hogs: "The orchard occupies thirty-two acres and is made the run of thirty hogs and one hundred and fifty or two hundred sheep and lambs during the summer. Enough grain and bran are given them to place them in good condition. They eat every blade of grass and green things close down and every fallen apple as soon as dropped, for which purpose sheep are better than hogs, which sleep so soundly as not to hear an apple fall, but sheep are always on hand and devour everything as soon as it touches the ground. The fruit each year grows fairer, with fewer worming specimens, and the manure, from feeding so much grain, has given a healthy growth to the trees. To prevent the animal from gnawing the bark the trunk is washed over once a month with a mixture of soap suds, whale oil and sheep manure. If the animals are given a constant supply of fresh water they have less disposition to eat the bark. The profits of this treatment consist in placing the sheep in the best condition, in finely growing lambs and in heavy crops of fruit for market.

HOW TO MAKE PEPPERMINT DROPS.—Take a convenient quantity of granulated sugar, place it in a pan having a lip from which the contents may be poured or dropped; add a very little water, just enough to make the sugar a stiff paste, two ounces of water to a pound of sugar being about the right proportion; set it over the fire and allow it to nearly boil, keeping it continually stirred; it must not actually come to a full boil, but must be removed from the fire just as the bubbles, denoting the boiling point is reached, begin to rise. Allow the syrup to cool a little, stirring all the time; add strong essence of peppermint to suit the taste, and drop on tins, or sheets of smooth, white paper. The dropping is performed by tilting the vessel slightly, so that the contents will slowly run out, and with a small piece of stiff wire the drops may be stroked off on to the tins or paper. They should then be kept in a warm place for a few hours to dry. If desired, a little red coloring may be added just previous to dropping, or a portion may be dropped in a plain, white form, and the remainder colored.—Confectioner and Baker.

A GOOD BREAKFAST.—Food and Health gives this timely advice on the above subject: "The breakfast we take in winter will determine our efficiency for work during the day, and will so influence our whole being for that period of time that no after meal can correct it. It must contain more nitrogenous food than in summer; it is absolutely needed. You must store heat to furnish material for absorption and for maintaining vitality; add to this nitrogenous food something that will disengage heat from the blood, and keep up temperature, and you may defy the coldest day. Your face may feel it, your hands may feel it, but your body will be impervious to it and go on disengaging that inward heat which alone withstands the lowered temperature without. If this first meal has been properly attended to, we may presume that vital action can be maintained in full force for five hours at least before it needs replenishing."

BOILED CODFISH AND OYSTER SAUCE.—Wash two pounds of fresh codfish in cold water, then boil it for twenty minutes with a little salt and vinegar, and a bit of onion added to the water. Lay a folded napkin on a hot platter, and on this serve the slice of cod, accompanied by oyster sauce. Put two dozen oysters, with their liquor, into a sauce-pan and place it on the fire. Bring it to a full boil, remove immediately and drain off the liquor. Put an ounce of butter into a sauce-pan, and, when it melts, stir in half an ounce of flour; when smooth add by degrees the oyster liquor, and stir until the mixture is thick and smooth, then put in two tablespoonfuls of sweet cream and season to taste with pepper and salt.

EGG PLANT.—How to Cook it.—Purple ones are best. Take them fresh, pull out the stem, par-boil them to take out the bitter taste, cut them in slices an inch thick without peeling them, dip them in the yolk of an egg and cover them with grated bread and a little salt and pepper. When one side has dried over the other in the same way; then fry them nice and brown. They are very delicious. The egg plant may be dressed thus: par-boil it after scraping off the rind, cut a slit the whole lenght and take out the seed, fill the space with rich, fine meat, stew it in well, eat with seasoned gravy, or bake and serve it up with gravy in the dish.

MANGO PICKLES.—Select smooth skinned melons; when ready to put them in a weak brine, and let them remain in it about ten days; then take out in a preserving kettle, cover with cold water, and place upon the stove and bring to a scalding heat, but do not let them boil; then take out, and after removing the seed, sprinkle the inside well with mustard seed, and fill up with small cucumbers, previously soaked in brine, nasturtion, onions, if you like, fine cut cabbage, and any spices that you prefer; tie up well and place in good cider vinegar, and you will soon have fine, tender mangoes.

BEEF SOUP.—Take a nice beef shank or soup bone, wash it clean and chop it into three or four pieces. Place it in boiling water and let it boil up. Skin well; add a few pepper corns and allspice berries, and two onions sliced fine. Let it boil slowly for five or six hours. Four or five quarts of cold water, according to size of bone, should first be used, and let it boil down to two quarts or three pints. An hour before it is to be dished, add two carrots and two small turnips, chopped very fine. Mutton bones from roast meat will make excellent soup if they are prepared in same way.

COOKING CHICKENS.—Cut them into pieces, sprinkle with pepper and salt and dredge with flour. Have ready a sauce-pan, with hog fat extracted from salt pork, in which fry, or rather sauce the chickens, covering them, and watching that they may not burn. Take up, drain and set aside in a hot covered dish. Pour into the gravy left in frying-pan a cup of rich milk, thicken with a tablespoonful of flour, add a lump of butter, some parsley and a young celery plant minced, boil up, season to taste and pour over the hot chicken.

PRESSED CHICKENS.—Boil the chicken until the meat will separate from the bones readily; use just as little water as possible to cook it in; after you have taken the chicken out and removed the bones cut it in small pieces, and put back into the kettle with the broth and boil until very tender; then put it into a basin and turn what little broth remains in the kettle over it, put on a press and leave until cold. When cold slice it thin and serve for tea or lunch.

BOSTON PIE.—(Without shortening.)—Three eggs, one coffee cup of coffee sugar, one and one-half cups of flour, one teaspoonful of cream-tartar, one-half teaspoonful of soda, salt. Bake on two round tins, when cold split and fill. Filling—two eggs, one half cup of flour, one cup of coffee sugar, stirred in a pint of boiling milk. Flavor with vanilla. Stir constantly to keep from scorching; put half in one pie; but on the top and sift pulverized sugar on, or put on frosting.

BROWNED PARSNIPS.—Wash and scrape the parsnips nicely and cut them in pieces, lengthwise. Parboil them slightly, then put them in a baking-pan, season with salt, pepper and plenty of butter, set them in the oven until done and nicely browned.

—Students of phisiology see that a final and conclusive law can not yet be [illegible] from the differences in brain weights and measurements, because of the present imperfection of such data. But there is an even broader and better foundation from which to build up a conclusion, and I propose to stand on this more general ground. In order, however, that such phisiological details may have due influence upon the general argument, I give a few of the best-established facts. Professor Bastian's work on the brain, published in 1880, sums up his studies of this organ as affected by sex. I condense or quote from him the following statements: "Difference of sex, in its influence over capacity of skull, is often greater than difference of race. * * * Difference of cranial capacity between the sexes increases with the development of the race, so that the male European excels much more the female than the negro the negress. The difference in the average capacity of the skulls of male and female among modern Parisians is almost double that between the skulls of the male and female inhabitants of ancient Egypt. * * * The general superiority, in absolute weight of the male over the female brain exists at every period of development. In newborn infants the brain was found by Tiedemann to weigh from 14½ ounces to 15½ ounces in the male, and from 10 ounces to 13½ ounces in the female, maximum weight of the adult male brain, in a series of 278 cases, was 65 ounces; the minium weight, 34 ounces. The maximum weight of the adult female brain, in a series of 191 cases, was 56 ounces; the minimum 31 ounces. In a large proportion the male brain ranges from 46 and 53 ounces, and the female between 41 and 47 ounces. A mean average weight of 49½ ounces may be deduced for the male, and 44 ounces for the female brain." It is further given, on the authority of Gratiolet and others, that the male brain can not fall below 37 ounces without involving idiocy; while the female may fall to 32 ounces without such a result. All accepted authorities agree that the average male brain exceeds the average female brain in weight by about ten per cent. Professor Thurnam also adds, "The brain-weight of the male negrow is the same as that of the female European."—Miss M. A. Hardaker, in Popular Science Monthly.

—WHERE THE BOULDERS COME FROM.—All have seen the immense boulders called "lost rock" in some sections, scattered over the northern part of the United States, which have little or no resemblance to any mass of rocks any where in the vicinity, and have perhaps asked the question: Where did they come from? Also the heaps of sand, gravel, and cobble stone of various sizes, which form many of our ridges, knolls and hills, and which are totally unlike any fixed rock near them. All these phenomena are attributed to a single cause, and that is the great sheet of ice which nature stored up ages ago without the necessity of protecting it in an ice-house. According to Agassiz, the sheet of ice extended in this country as far south as South Carolina or Alabama, and was thick enough to cover all the mountains of the eastern part of North America, with the exception of Mt. Washington. This peak projected, a lone sentinel on that vast waste of ice, two or three hundred feet. In the latitude of northern Massachusetts, he conceives the ice to have been two and three miles thick. The boulders were all torn off by the advancing ice sheet, from the projecting rocks over which it moved, or pushed as "bottom drift," scratching and plowing the surface over which they passed, and being scratched and polished themselves in return, till they were finally brought to rest by the melting of the ice. They were not carried as far south as the ice sheet extended, seldom beyond the parallel of forty degrees north. The native copper of Lake Superior was drifted four or five hundred miles south; and the pudding stones of Roxbury, Mass., were carried as far south as the Islands of Penikese.—Scientific American.

—THE COLORS OF THE SKY.—The explanation of the colors of the morning and evening skies, is thus stated by Sir John Lubbock, in his Presidential address before the British Association: Tyndall has taught us that the blue of the sky is due to the reflection of the blue rays by the minute particles floating in the atmosphere. Now, if from the white light of the sun, the blue rays are thus selected, those which are transmitted will be yellow, orange, and red. Where the distance is short, the transmitted light will appear yellowish. But as the sun sinks toward the horizon, the atmospheric distance increases, and consequently the number of the scattering particles. They weaken in succession the violet, the indigo, the blue, and even disturb the proportions of green. The transmitted light under such circumstances must pass from yellow, through orange to red, and thus, while we at noon are admiring the deep blue of the sky, the same rays, robbed of their blue, are elsewhere lighting up the evening sky with all the glories of sunset.

—PEARL HUNTING IN TENNESSEE.—The search for pearls in the mussels of Ohio has been a considerable industry for years. The Nashville American reports an outbreak of pearl hunting in Stone river, Rutherford county Tennessee. Not less than five hundred people were engaged daily in raking the bottom of that stream; delving down in the mud for mussels, which are piled along the banks, opened, and critically examined for the treasurers contained in many of them. One pearl is reported for each eighty dollars was paid in New York. The general range of value, however, is said to be from fifty cents to twenty-five dollars.—Eclectic.

—C. W. Siemens has recently presented to the Royal Society a paper of much interest upon the effect of the electric light upon vegetation. He finds it to answer perfectly the purpose of sunlight. Chlorophyll is formed, and all the functions of plant life are perfectly carried on under its influence; and, what is interesting and important, he finds that plants need no rest or sleep for their perfect growth. So that, by illuminating a hot house at night with the electric light, the fruits and flowers can be brought forward with great rapidity and without injury to the plant, tree, or vine.

—The number of microscopic organisms seem to be nearly as numerous as the multitude which are prominently visible to the naked eye, and new species continue to be added to the number already known. From the cellar of an old ruin at Lehigh Gap, Pennsylvania, Mr. Edward Potts found four species of minute fresh-water sponges, all of which appeared to him to be new.

The Sacred City of Northern Africa.

The French people are very fond of quoting their favorite proverb, C'est le premier pas qui coute—"It is the first step which costs"—but practically they are quite inclined to take this step without counting the cost. This was very emphatically the case when they began the invasion of Tunis under the pretense of punishing a few predatory Kroumirs who annoyed them in their Algerine territory adjoining. In the conflict they have been led on step by step, as under the influence of the siren's song, until they have finally taken the dangerous step of seizing the sacred city of Islam for all Northern Africa, a measure that may stir up against them a bitterness of feeling on the part of the Moslem Arabs that will not be soon or easily allayed.

This fact will make Kairwan the centre of observation for a time, and virtually reveal it to the world, which has scarcely been aware of its existence. It was once the seat of a caliphate, and was so sacred that the Moslems called it one of the four gates af Paraillse, and consigned to it a very valuable relic in the beard of the prophet. This city is not large, though it looks so while approaching it. It has a population of about 15,000, but its houses can scarsobe seen because of the multitude of cupolas and the forest of minarets that rise from its sacred edifices. It is the most genuinely Moorish and Oriental city on earth, being not at all disfigured by the modern architecture of the unbelievers. Like all sacred cities of Islam, it is protected from defilement by a law that prevents all infidels from entering it, and therefore but few Europeans have trodden its streets, and these only in the disguise of Mohammedans. To enter its mosques was death to these intruders. Even the Bey of Tunis could not protect the officials of other countries from the violence of the inhabitants. The German African traveler, Maltzan, who visited it some twenty years ago with a goverauntent permit, could appear in the streets only in Oriental garb; otherwise the governor of the city was unwilling to guarantee his safety. This authority declares it the cleanest and neatest city of all Islam, being free from the ordinary filth and ruins of most African cities, and containing many large buildings devoted to the purposes of schools and other religious objects. Kairwan of Northern Africa as regards the immense number of its sacred edifices, of which the most important is the mosque of Owaib, who was a companion in arms of the prophet, and who brought his beard from Mecca to Kairwan in a holy war. He fell at this point, and begged that he might be buried near this sacred relic, and thus arose the mosque that contains his bones and the sacred beard.

Kairwan is not only a sacred city, but is also devoted to some prominent industries. In its bazars may be found beautiful specimens of copper utensils, that are exported to great distances, and the finest manufactures in leather. The skilfully embroidered Arabian saddles often command the sum of five hundred dollars. The famous yellow slippers of Africa are manufactured here in the greatest perfection. But all these industries are overshadowed in value by the essence of roses, or, as it is called, the oil of roses of Kairwan. This precious unction may here be obtained pure and comparatively cheap. The history of Kairwan is at the same time the history of all Mohammedan Africa in the period of its brilliancy, for in the Middle Ages this city, that now only lives in its fanaticism and its sacred places, was the mighty capital of a broad realm that was little less than Europe in extent. From here went forth the decrees that ruled all Africa from the Red Sea to the Straits of Gibraltar, and from the Mediterranean to the borders of the desert, while Sicily, Corsica, and a portion of Southern Italy did obeisance to it. But, after the long struggles of various dynasties, it became finally an unimportant and hidden city, whose existence was scarcely known to the world.

The mighty change that it must now undergo under French rule can scarcely be conceived. As the French forces approached, the inhabitants withdrew, as it seems, without much resistance, with little destruction of the city and its monuments. The French have, therefore, a great treasure, for the meanest stone is a relic to the moslem, and scarcely a structure is without its story. The most interesting portion of the capture to the Christian world will be the stores of Moslem lore supposed to be gathered in the libraries of its great school, for here is found the most celebrated school of the Koran in all Africa, if not in all the realm of Mohammed. Here the most celebrated scholars of Islam deal in their hair-splitting subtleties; here are found the best expiatis of the Koran. In the eyes of the orthodox Moslems, Kairwan is still what it once was—the school of divine wisdom which the profane may not enter and desecrate with impunity. And they believe that the justice and just vengeance of Allah will punish every infidel who dares to desecrate the sacred city. It will thus be seen that the French have taken upon themselves a burden but will not be easy to carry.—Methodist Quarterly.

The Popes Palace at Avignon.

The popes are gone from Avignon, but their ancient palace remains, the monument at once of their glory and their shame, their power and their cruelty. If one would learn the spirit of the church of Rome in the Middle Ages, let him spend a day in the palace of the popes at Avignon. It is an enormous pile, not unworthy to be compared with the Vatican, extending, I should think, over several acres, and with its massive walls and lofty towers looks more like a fortress than the peaceful abode of the vicar of christ. Indeed, it is not at all unlikely that it was built with the idea that it might some day have to stand a seige. For the same purpose Avignon was surrounded with a wall like the fortified cities of the Middle Ages.

In the palace, the consistory—the place of meeting of the conclave, or college of cardinals—is (or was) a magnificent hall, more than a hundred feet long, spanned by great arches, supported by columns like those of a cathedral. The effect of this is lost since the palace was turned into barracks, and even this stately and sacred apartment has been cut into dormitories, and soldiers now sleep on their camp bedsteads or burnish their arms where once cardinals deliberated on the interests of the Catholic church. But the eye still traces the proportions of the massive columns, and the exquisite finish of their capitals, and other signs of former magnificence and splendor.

All this is very grand, but there other parts of this ancient and sacred edifice in which the beauty of the architecture cannot hide the terrible purpose of their construction. The residence of the popes—like that of the doges in Venice—was both a palace and a prison. At one end of the great architectural pile stands a tower seven stories high, which was devoted to the inquisition. Here sat that ghastly tribunal, in silence and secrecy, bringing before it those accused of heresy, extorting confessions by torture, and hurrying its victims to execution. There was the chamber of question, and the chamber of torture, which was so constructed that no sound could escape through the thick walls, and no one without could hear the shrieks of the wretched victims, or imagine the work of hell that was going on within. There one may still see the chamber of the holy office, in which the accused made their last confessions before going to punishment. This, strange to say, adjoins the banquet hall, for in those "good old times" popes and cardinals feasted while the victims of their cruelty were dying so near them. There was a hall in which those condemned to suffer by fire were burnt. The vault is still blackened with the flames. And there is a small window, which is as significant as the lion's in the Doge's palace at Venice: for it opens into the Oubliette, and through this the condemned were pushed to fall to a tremendous depth, to be received on the points of spears and spikes turned upward from below.—Henry Field in Evangelist.

The Old Scotchman's Prayer.

I was pleased the other day with a story which an aged Scotch minister told me about an old Scotchman, who, many years ago, was on his way to a meeting of the people of God, held in a tent or some such temporary structure.

The old pilgrim was poor, and ill clad, and partly deaf, but he trusted in the Lord whom he served, and rejoiced in his kind providence. On his way to the meeting, he fell in with another Christian brother, a younger man, bound on the same errand, and they travelled on together.

When they had nearly reached the place of meeting, it was proposed that they should turn aside behind the hedge, and have a little prayer before they entered the meeting. They did so, and the old man, who had learned in everything to let his requests be made known unto God, presented his case in language ke the following:

"Lord, ye ken weel enough that I'm deaf, and I want a seat on the first bench, if ye can leave me have it, so I can hear thy word. And ye see that my toes are sticking through my shoes, and I don't think it much to your credit to have your children's toes sticking through their shoes, and, therefore, I want ye to get me a pair of new ones. And ye ken I have nae siller, and I want to stay there during the meeting, and, therefore, I want ye to get me a place to stay."

When the old man had finished his quaint petition, and they had started on, his younger brother gently suggested to him that he thought his prayer was rather free in [illegible] expression, and hardly [illegible] proper to [illegible] the Supreme Be[illegible] d may did not accept the in[illegible] tion of irreverance.

"He's my Father," said he, "and I'm well acquainted with him, and he's well acquainted with me, and I take great liberties with him."

So they went on to the meeting together. The old man stood for a while, in the rear of the congregation, making an ear-trumpet of his hand to catch words, until some one near the pulpit noticed him, and, beckoning him forward, gave him a good seat upon the front bench. During the prayer the old man knelt down, and after he rose, a lady, who had noticed his shoes, said to him:

"Are those the best shoes you have?"

"Yes," said he, "but I expect my Father will get me a new pair very soon."

"Come with me after meeting," said the lady, "and I will get you a new pair."

The service closed, and he went with her to her house.

"Shall you stay during the meeting?" said the good woman, as they went along.

"I would, but I am a stranger in the place, and have nae siller."

"Well," said she, "you will be perfectly welcome to make your home at our house during the meeting."

The old man thanked the Lord that he had given him all the three things he had asked for; and, while his younger brother's reverence for the Lord was right and proper, it is possible that he might have learned that there is reverence that reaches higher than the forms and conventionalities of human taste, and which leads the believer to come boldly to the throne of grace to find all needed help in every trying hour.

MONEY AND ITS USE.—One celebrated writer gravely exhorts another his countrymen, in order to banish all vice at once, to "throw all their money into the sea." But is not all this mere empty rant? Is there any solid reason therein? By no means. For let the world be as corrupt as it will, is gold or silver to blame? "The love of money is the root of all evil;" but not the thing itself. The fault does not lie in the money, but in them that use it. It may be used ill; and what may not? But it may likewise be used well; it is full as applicable to the best as to the worst uses. It is of unspeakable service to all civilized nations, in all the common affairs of life; it is a most compendious instrument of transacting all manner of business, and (if we use it according to Christian wisdom) of doing all manner of good. It is true, were man in a state of innocence all men "filled with the Holy Ghost," so that, like the infant Church at Jerusalem, no man counted anything he had his own," but "distribution was made to every one as he had need," the use of it would be superceded—as we cannot conceive there is anything of the kind among the inhabitants of heaven. But in the present state of mankind it is an excellent gift of God, answering the noblest ends. In the hands of his children it is food for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, raiment for the naked; it gives to the traveller and the stranger where to lay his head. By it we may supply the place of a husband to the widow, and of a father to the fatherless. We may be a defense for the oppressed, a means of health to the sick, of ease to them that are in pain; it may be as eyes to the blind, as feet to the lame; yea, a lifter up from the gates of death! It is, therefore, of the highest concern, that all who fear God know how to employ this valuable talent; that they be instructed how it may answer these glorious ends, and in the highest degree.—Rev. John Wesley.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health;" and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proved by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

SWEET BREATH AND GOOD DIGESTION.

The breath sweetened, foul odors from the body removed, food thoroughly digested, good health permanently maintained, by using Brown's Iron Bitters. A trite strengthener; a sure reviver.

—It is reported by the Religious Tract Society of London, that for the past twelve years the Spanish people have purchased a larger number of the Scriptures in proportion to their population, than the French or Italian.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

MEMPHIS, Feb. 21.—A Helena (Ark.) special says: The day opened with a strong wind blowing from the north, and many congratulated themselves that the cold snap would have a tendency to check the volume of water from the upper rivers, but their hopes were dashed to the ground on receipt of dispatches which announced the floods pouring down the Ohio and Missouri rivers. The river here declined one-half inch, but further material decline is not looked for.

The situation is one that calls for relief from some quarter. Every day reports reach here of numerous cases of almost actual want among the people, both white and black, in the submerged districts. Our citizens are becoming more reconciled to the situation and rapidly adapting themselves to the inconveniences that surround them.

CHICAGO, Feb. 22.—Reports from points throughout the West all tell the same story of flood and disaster. Rain has been general and in many places accompanied by wind and sleet. Telegraph wires last night in every direction were down and many railroads badly washed out.

Between Cairo and Memphis the following points of land only are visible above the surging flood: The bluffs at Columbus, the hills back of Hickman, land on the Tennessee side, opposite Island No. 10; New Madrid, Point Pleasant, Tiptonville, Fulton Bluffs, Randolph, Richardson's Islands 35 and 36 and Dean's Island, above the head of Centenial Cut Off, forty miles above Memphis.

The results, however, except from river floods, will not be disastrous. The most serious inconvenience is from the suspension of traffic. Along the Ohio and lower Mississippi, however, the disastrous effects of the floods seem to be increasing.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23.—The Senate to-day passed the bill to place Gen. Grant upon the retired list by a vote of 35 to 17. Five Democrats, namely, Messrs. Davis, of West Virginia, Call, Brown, Ransom, and Jones of Florida, voted in the affirmative. The remainder of the Democrats voted in the negative. Mr. Bayard offered a substitute, the proposition being to put the ex-Presidents on the pension list at one-fourth of their salary; but this was voted down overwhelmingly. The debate was very general. Some of the speeches made in support of the bill by Democrats were most extraordinary. The feeling of most of the Democrats was that the brutal and corrupt despotism of the Grant administration constituted a valid reason why Congress should not go out of its way to compliment this man. Senator Jonas, of Louisiana, in a very spirited and forcible manner, gave expression to this feeling, referring in his remarks to the oppressions heaped by Grant upon the people of Louisiana. The bill passed by a vote of two to one, and is pretty certain to pass the House at an early day. When informed gentlemen say that Gen. Grant is now getting about $15,000 a year income out of the fund raised for him by George Jones, and an equal sum from his own property. The pay of a retired general of the army would swell his income to nearly $50,000 per year.

Mr. Logan reported back from the Military Committee the joint resolution introduced earlier in the day by Mr. George, to provide relief on account of overflow of the Mississippi, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The joint resolution was at once taken up, the substitute adopted and the same passed without debate.

It appropriated $100,000 to be used by the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi and its tributaries, and authorizes the Secretary to co-operate with the authorities of the several States of which such district is part, in making the distribution of the same as reported. The measure provided this relief for the laboring classes, but upon the suggestion of Messrs. Hoar and Sherman the change was made as stated. Executive session. Adjourned.

HOUSE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23.—On motion of Mr. King, of Louisiana, the Senate joint resolution appropriating $100,000 to enable the Secretary of War to issue rations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Mississippi river was taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The house then, at five o'clock, took a recess until 7:30 P. M., the evening session to be for the consideration of the District of Columbia Code bill.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 23.—The steamship Illinois, with the 325 Russian Jewish refugees on board, arrived in the river to-day. They bear marks of hardship and tell distressful stories. The relief committee met them at Newcastle and informed them of the plans for their benefit. They are profoundly impressed with what they have heard, particularly of offers of homes in the South. Most of them are tradesmen and a few are farmers.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The amounts allowed by the committee to audit the expenses of the sickness and burial of President Garfield, and to the attending surgeons, are stated by a member of the committee as follows: To Dr. Bliss, $25,000; to Drs. Agnew and Hamilton, $15,000 each; to Drs. Boynton and Boynton, $10,000; to Mrs. Dr. Edson, $5000; Mr. Crump, the steward, is allowed $3000, and the other employees of the Executive Mansion two months' extra pay. The committee recommends the appointment of Surveon General Barnes to the rank of Major General and his retirement at that grade, and the promotion of Dr. Woodward to the rank Lieutenant Colonel. The committee has also agreed to grant to Mrs. Garfield the remainder of her husband's salary for the current year. The report will not be unanimous. Messrs. Springer and Blackburn will submit a minority report opposing most of the items allowed.

The President to-day sent to the Senate the following nominations: Roscoe Conkling, to be Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court; A. A. Sargent, to be Minister to Germany; Walter H. Johnson, Collector of Internal Revenue, Second District of Georgia; Harry F. Gilsoom, Postmaster at Chattanooga, Tenn.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 25.—The contract for building the gap of fifty miles in the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad, belonging to the Erlanger system, extending from Arcadia to Shreveport, was to day signed by the contractors, Messrs. Rogers, Rexford & James, of New York and New Orleans, whose office is at Shreveport. The road is to be completed by November 1, 1882.

VICKSBURG, Feb. 26.—The steamboat Bertie Claiborne burned to the water's edge yesterday at Whiting Lake Landing, Steel's Bayou. The cargo, consisting of 166 bales of cotton and 300 sacks of cotton seed, was totally destroyed. Loss $15,000. Insurance not known. One negro man and three children drowned.

MEMPHIS, Feb. 27.—The river at this point now marks 35 feet 3 inches, which is up to the highest point this season, and continues to rise slowly. Reports from Crittenden, Miss., St. Francis and Phillips counties, Ark., are to the effect that great distress prevails among the inhabitants in the inundated districts. Appeals for assistance are daily received, and the picture drawn of the situation is gloomy.

LITTLE ROCK, Feb. 27.—The river continues to rise at this point at the rate of half an inch an hour. The steamer Woodson, from Pine Bluff, reports the banks having been overflowed at Pattey's levee, forty miles below here. Adamsburg, fourteen miles above Pine Bluff, is inundated, and the whole of Pastoria county is under water.

CAIRO, Feb. 27.—The Ohio and Mississippi rivers began falling last evening, and up to this time have each fallen five inches. Though the people feel more encouraged, the prospects of danger upon the Mississippi levee is still great.

NEW YORK, Feb. 27.—The widow of Daniel Webster, American statesman, died at New Rochelle, last night. She was Webster's second wife.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—Attention has turned from Conkling to Blaine, whose Garfield memorial address today was heard by an audience as large as the Representatives' Hall could accommodate, and composing such an assemblage of distinguished persons as only the capital of the nation can furnish. President Arthur and his Cabinet, Justices of the Supreme Court, Gens. Sherman, Sheridan, Hancock, Howard and Meigs. The historian Bancroft, the philanthropist W. W. Corcoran and Cyrus W. Field occupied seats of honor in front of the Speaker. Back of these sat Admirals Porter and Worden, the English, German, French, Japanese, Chinese and other diplomats, the judges of the Court of Claims, Gen. Sherman's staff and Dr. D. W. Bliss, chief surgeon to the late President. On the right were grouped the Senate, who were accommodated by the removal of about half of the desks on the Democratic side. Representatives and distinguished persons admitted to special privileges filled up the remainder of the hall.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA, Feb. 26.—It is officially announced that the Austrian common encountered 1000 insurgents at Krosta on Thursday, and after nine hours' fighting carried of a large number of their dead. Two Austrians were killed and six wounded.

SWANS—There are ten varieties of the swan, four of which belong to England. The tame or mute swan, is the most familiar species known in the British Isles. This elegant and graceful bird has long been partially domesticated there, and enjoys legal protection to a certain extent. The swan is presumed to be a royal bird—that is, the property of the crown, and only to be possessed by a subject under a special grant. To each licence thus granted was attached a "swan mark," which was cut on the upper mandible of the birds, in order to show the right of the owner. The marks are of endless variety, partly heraldic, and are contrived so as to pain the bird as little as possible. The process of marking the swans is called "swan-upping." It is conducted with much ceremony.

The food of the swan consists mostly of vegetable substances, and the bird can be readily fattened on barley, like ordinary poultry. Sometimes they will feed upon animal food, and have been seen to catch and swallow small fish, such as bleak and the roach. In the spawning season the swan is a terrible enemy to the fish, haunting all the spawning grounds, and swallowing the eggs until it can eat no longer. For this reason they are to be removed from the Thames, where they annually destroy large quantities of eggs.

The nest of the swan is a very large mass of reeds, rushes and grasses, set upon the bank close to the water's edge. The mother is very watchful over the nest and young, and, in company with her mate, assaults any intruder upon her premises—any bad boy, for instance, in search of eggs.

If in the water, the swan is able to sink herself so low that the young can scramble upon her back; and if on land, she helps them up by means of one leg.

A MONKEY TRAP.—An old, hard cocoanut is taken, and a very small hole made in the shell. Furnished with this and a pocketful of boiled rice, the sportsman sallies into the forest, and stops beneath a tree tenanted by monkeys. Within full sight of those inquisitive spectators, he first eats a little rice, and then puts a quantity into the cocoanut, with all the ostentation possible. The nut is then laid upon the ground, and the hunter retires to a convenient ambush. The monkey may be sure that no sooner is the man out of sight than the monkeys race helter skelter for the cocoanut. The first arrival peeps into it, and seeing the plentiful store of rice inside, squeezes his hand in through the tiny hole and clutches a handful. Now, so paramount is greed over every other feeling connected with monkey nature, that nothing will induce the creature to relinquish his hold. With his hand thus clasped, he can not possibly extract it; but the thought that, if he lets go, one of his brethren will obtain the feast, is overpowering. The sportsman soon appears upon the scene. The unencumbered monkeys fly in all directions; but the unfortunate brute, who still will not let the rice go, is thereby handicapped beyond hope with a cocoanut as large as himself—a state of affairs quite fatal to rapid locomotion, either terrestrial or arboreal. The sequel is that he falls an easy capture to the hunter, a victim to his own greed. Even when caught, he reads in the actions of his captor a design to rob him of his rice; and he clutches it the harder, and the very first thing he does when the nut is cracked and the hand released, is to cram its contents into his mouth. Thoughts of escape come afterward.—London Field.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.—The works in connection with the Channel Tunnel experiments at the new heading at Shakespeare Cliff, Dover, have been so successful that the first quarter of a mile is now completed. What looks especially encouraging is that the engineers are able to gradually increase the rate of progress. It has attained the excellent average of thirty-six feet per day, and in addition to this the soil is now quite dry, there being a total absence of springs, the presence of which proved a source of much delay in the Abbot's Cliff heading. There are about eighty men engaged on the works. They are employed in two night and day shifts, but it is proposed shortly to have an extra shift working eight hours each to expedite the work. No boring is done on Sunday, the men being chiefly employed on that day in lengthening the double line of metals in which the trollies carrying the output travel. The tunnel has advanced several yards under the sea in the direction of the Admiralty Pier.

THE LIBRARIES OF EUROPE.—According to an English authority, Vienna possesses 577 libraries, containing altogether 5,500,000 volumes, without counting manuscripts. The nation which comes next to Austria is said to be France, which boasts 500 libraries, containing 4,500,000 volumes. Italy is not far behind, with 1,350,000 volumes; and next Prussia, with about 400 libraries and above 2,500,000 books. Great Britian is reported as having only 200 libraries, but they are allowed to contain nearly a quarter of a million more printed books than Prussia. As to the individual libraries, the largest in size is that of Paris, with something over 2,000,000 volumes; the British Museum comes second, but a long way behind, with 1,000,000; Munich third, with 800,000; then Berlin, with 700,000; Dresden, with 500,000; and Vienna can be set down as containing only 30,000 printed books, but is very rich in valuable manuscripts, the total of which is reckoned at 25,000. The most celebrated and largest of the university libraries are the Bodleian, at Oxford, and that of Heidelberg, each of which is set down as possessing about 500,000 volumes.—Appleton's Journal.

Du Maurier, of the London Punch, was recently at a musical party, and applied a test to discover whether or not a singer was an amateur or a professional. He said to the lady, in his benevolent manner: "Are you in a good voice?" She replied: "Capital voice. Never better." Du Maurier said: "She is a professional. If she had been an amateur, she would have had a cold."

Mr. Alexander Grunnell, of Albany, N. Y., says: "I have been for years troubled with great weakness of my digestive organs, which seemed to be always out of fix. Most usually I suffered from constipation, and at other times a severe running-off at the bowels would set in. No remedy I ever tried would regulate this function until I tried Brown's Iron Bitters. It really benefitted me from the first day I used it. My habits are now perfectly regular, and as a strengthener of the digestive organs, I think Brown's Iron Bitters is worth its weight in diamonds."

A WONDERFUL and
SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERY

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

YEARS AGO.

Near the bank of that lone river,
Where the water-lillies grow,
Breathed the fairest flower that ever
Bloomed and faded years ago.

How we met and how we parted,
None on earth can ever know;
Nor how pure and gentle-hearted
Beamed the mourned one years ago.

Like the stream with lillies laden
Will life's future current flow,
Till in heaven I meet the maiden
Fondly cherished years ago.

Hearts that love like mine, forget not.
They're the same in weal or woe
And the stars of memory set not
In the grave of years ago.

Short Articles on Providence—No. 1.

MR. EDITOR: The following articles have been suggested by an article in the Southern Review, for January, 1882, written by Dr. D. C. Kelley in reply to one written by Dr. C. W. Miller on "Fraternity." In the controversy between them on "Fraternity" I wish to take no part. Your short editorial in the ADVOCATE, for February 9, is exactly to my taste, and, no doubt, reflects the sentiment of nine-tenths of our people. But Dr. Kelley has incidentally wrung Providence into the matter in such a way that I think it not out of place in me to review him. I should ask a place in the Review but for the reason that Dr. Miller will doubtless occupy that in the "Fraternity" discussion. But I must here quote a most objectionable paragraph:

"It is freely allowed (1) that in the battle of the past both parties thought they were in the right, and deserve the praise which belongs to honest men; (2) that in the history of these years much has been done on both sides which illustrates the weakness of good men; (3) that slavery has come to be so universally recognized as a great moral wrong, that the effort to relegate it to the State as a purely civil institution can only be regarded as a temporary parallax of good men under great trial; (4) that God in his providence used the cupidity of the English and Northern slave trader to bring the negro to America, as he did the cupidity of Joseph's brethren to bring him to Egypt; (5) that he used the surroundings of the slave owner to retain him in contact with the superior race through years of needed tuteluge, which tuteluge was to him a necessity as a preparation for future growth, as was Israel's stay in Egypt; (6) that this temporary need of the negro many good men mistook as indicative of a permanent divine purpose; (7) that these were good men we affirm now and forever; that God used the "fanatical abolition" sentiment of the North for the emancipation of the negro, as surely as that he called Moses to the work of Israelitish deliverance from Egypt; (8) that so far as continuing to hold the doctrine that the church must abstain from all teaching on civil questions, the true doctrine is that wherever a moral question has been adversely acted on by the State, the necessity for fearless outspoken truth becomes the more urgent upon the part of the church."

The doctor tells us that this does not mean to be an endorsement of all that the abolitionists have done, and I am very glad he told us, for I should have misunderstood him. I have numbered the members of this long sentence for the sake of easy reference without requoting language. Of 1 and 2 I have nothing to say, only that it must have cost intense labor to have reached the conclusion as stated. The objectionable feature of 3 is the implication that formerly our leaders and people denied the moral wrong of slavery while now they affirm. As a historical fact neither implication is correct. Our leaders did not deny, but admitted that it was an evil, and deplored it as such. But they held its immorality to consist not in "the abstract," but in "the concrete." They held that there were evils attending the freeing of the slave worse than that of bondage. They insisted that agitation postponed rather than accelerated the consummation of the freedom of the slave. On the other hand, we do not now affirm the evil of slavery. Our authorities are silent. Our speakers and writers have little to say of it. A few converts to negrophilism, as typed by the North, are zealous in regard to the great evil. But most of us think little, and care less, of the matter. We notice that the statutes of Moses are still in the Bible, and that some of them define the relation of master and slave. The revisionists have left unmarred the beautiful story of the pious centurion, whose servant (slave) Jesus healed and declared the master to be a better man than any of the church members! We still read Paul and Peter, who instruct both master and slaves as to their relative duties. And, finally, I do not hesitate to say that if any part of the United States allowed slavery, and a member of our church, where slavery was tolerated, owned a slave, and was otherwise unimpeachable, he would not be expelled. Not that our church advocates slavery; but it never did and does not now hold that the fact of being a slave holder will of itself "exclude a man from the kingdom of grace and glory." Yet the Southern Church never voted slavery in or out.

Number 4, 5, 6 and 7 put a vast deal of dirty work on Providence. I do not know how many "freely allow" all that wonderful tangle of providences and counter-providences of enormous crimes and needed tutelage, and the befogging of the clearest minds of the Anglo-Saxon master in order to the expansion of the contracted cranium of the Afro-American. I am willing for the doctor to put it all into his confession of faith; but I ask him to excuse my infirmity of doubt, when I say that I do not believe that Providence ever had any use for all the villainies of the slave catcher, nor all the evils of bondage for the emancipation of the negro! If that be true, then why not allow the slave trader to be a co-worker with us in the evangelization of the world? If Providence can use such abominable agencies to effect good, why may not man? "Shall man be more pure than his Maker?". I think it time that we were throwing away this God-dishonoring relic of Calvinism, which lays all the crimes of the ages on Providence, who waits to wind up the whole game of heartless rascality and diabolism by showing how nicely he can do a thing when he gets everything ready! Here endeth the first lesson!

"Distribution of the Conference Fund."

In a former article I have given some reasons for making time of service the basis of the division of the Conference fund. In that article the reasons stated are: 1. Such a basis will be in harmony with the universally accepted principle that all remuneration ought to correspond with, and depend upon, the amount of service rendered. 2. It will encourage habits of economy among the preachers, and will not, as the present law seems to do, offer a premium on prodigality. 3. It will keep out of our Conferences men who, by reason of age or infirmity, are unable to do full work in the ranks of the itinerancy. Articles in our church papers of recent date advocating the same law, and letters of approval and commendation received, confirm me in the belief that the change in the law recommended will not only give general satisfaction, but is really demanded as an act of simple justice to men, who, under the present law, are ignored in the distribution of this money. One case has been brought to my notice, where an aged brother, who has served the church for more than fifty years, has not received anything from the Conference collection, though, for several years, he has been among the superannuates of his Conference. He does not press his claim, and, though in need so as to be embarrassed, his brethren pass that claim by in silence, from year to year, all because he has a home and seems to be comfortable. If it is just to deprive a superannuate of his right to an acknowledgement of the services he has given to the church, because he has some property, or may be at little expense, why is it not equally just to take the amount of their salary from men in active work, who may have a fortune, or who may have no family dependent on them. Boards of Stewards, now-a-days, rarely take a man's circumstances into consideration in fixing his salary. Men who own property, who are unmarried, or who being married, are without children, receive, as a rule, as much for their service as those who are poor, or are burdened with large families. Why should this rule be set aside in the case of superannuated preachers? If claimants do not need the amount due them, they, and they alone, are the ones to dispose of it. If they have a choice, and surely they have, let them designate the persons to whom their money is to go. Financial boards, except with their consent, ought not to act for them.

All that is necessary to make the law correspond to the views I have presented, is to strike out from the instructions given to the "joint board" the words, "their best judgment of their several necessities," and insert in their place, "the number of years said preachers, or deceased members of the Conference, have served the church in the work of the ministry." Each Board of Finance ought to be left to its own discretion in arranging the scale of division. I suggest that the following scale is a fair one. Superannuates whose term of service has been from ten to fifteen years to receive $200; from fifteen to twenty, $250; from twenty to twenty-five, $300; from twenty-five to thirty, $350; from thirty to thirty-five, $400; from thirty-five to forty, $450; from forty and upwards, $500. Preachers whose term of service does not reach ten years not to be placed on the list of superannuates, until it is clearly shown that their inability to work has resulted from exposure, or necessary labor, as itinerant preachers. Of course, claims of widows and orphans of members of Conference will be the same as if such members should be alive.

Such a scale as the one here presented was adopted some years ago in one of our Conferences, and gave satisfaction to preachers and people. It was at last abandoned, however, as one of the Bishops decided that it was not according to the law of the church.

Hoping what I have said, Mr. Editor, will do no harm, if it does no good, I am as ever,

Truly yours,

HENRY D. MOORE.

Letter from East Tennessee.

MR. EDITOR: Holston Conference, in extent of territory, is very large. In length, it lies along the Memphis and Charleston, the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia, and the Norfolk and Western railroads, from southwest to northeast, some four hundred miles; while from the line of South Carolina, on the southeast, to its highest point in the State of West Virginia, on the northeast, the breadth is little, if any, less than the length. The width of the East Tennessee part is not so great. It lies like a wedge between two mountain ranges. It embraces a portion of Middle Tennessee, a small corner of Georgia, all of East Tennessee, a large portion of Western North Carolina and Southwestern Virginia and a portion of the State of West Virginia. Within this territory there is greater variety of climate than in any other Conference in our connection; greater than in the old Alabama Conference, which extended from the mountains of North Alabama to the Gulf of Mexico. The climate of Chattanooga and the valleys of lower East Tennessee is not unlike that of Vicksburg; while at Wytheville, Va., it is as cold as at Boston. East Tennessee is sheltered from the bleak northwest winds by the Cumberland mountains; while Wytheville, being twenty-three hundred feet above the sea, is exposed to all winds, and is therefore very cold. Wytheville, on account of its pure air, is a favorite place for persons seeking health. The Cumberland mountains stand along the line between Tennessee and Kentucky, with numerous spurs shooting out into our territory; while the grand old Alleghanies stand along the line between Tennessee and Georgia, and between Tennessee and North Carolina, and extend up through the North Carolina and Virginia portions of our territory. The highest peak of the latter range is nearly seven thousand feet above the sea. Between these two great mountain ranges there are valleys, as beautiful as the eye ever rested upon, and as fertile, many of them, as any part of our great country; while the scenery of our mountains and rivers is unsurpassed by anything on the American continent. God has piled up these grand mountains, and has sent cool refreshing breezes to skip over their summits and play along their sides, and has made springs of living water, containing great variety of minerals in almost every conceivable combination, to gush forth from their sides, and run down through these smiling valleys for the health and comfort of his creatures.

But Holston Conference has large men as well as mountains. Some of them are small in stature, but they have large heads and large, warm hearts. They know just how to take a stranger by the hand and make him feel at home among them. The church was planted in this country before we were born by such men as James Axley and Thomas Stringfield, and its growth, through the intervening years, has been steady and healthy. There are now within this territory 173 travelling, and 280 local preachers, and 43,638 white members, besides some black members and Indians. The District Conference of Chattanooga district was held at this place last week. It was presided over by Rev. John Boring, P. E., whose close examination of the different charges, on the lines indicated in the Discipline, brought out the fact that the health of the church in this country is not [illegible] that the promise of future growth and usefulness is very flattering. Our colleges were well represented and were reported as doing well. D. Sullins, D. D., president Emory and Henry; E. E. Wiley, D. D., president Martha Washington; Rev. D. S. Herron, president Sullins's Female, and Rev. F. M. Grace, president Victoria Female College, were present during the session and spoke cheering words in regard to the institutions over which they preside. The Holston Methodist, a necessity to this country just as the dear old ADVOCATE is to your country and to me, was represented by its wide awake and very efficient editor, Rev. F. Richardson. Dr. Wiley, by request, delivered an address on his visit to and his impressions of the Ecumenical Conference, which was thought by some to be the happiest effort of his life. It was greatly enjoyed by the large audience. News of the death of dear Bishop Wightman reached us during the session and appropriate memorial services were held. Words were spoken softly, for a great sorrow filled our hearts.

We have just been blessed with a gracious revival of religion in our church at this place, resulting in some thirty conversions. Brethren in attendance at the Conference did valuable work both in the pulpit and altar.

In my next I will speak of the colleges of this part of Tennessee. God bless you and the dear ADVOCATE.

W. H. LEITH.

SWEETWATER, TENN., Feb. 24, 1882.

Letter from Georgia.

During the years of my sojourn in Mississippi, Mr. Editor, the now famous Gilderoy was my presiding elder. He used to say that some men were weatherwise and some were otherwise. A friend of mine, the other day, went into the dangerous business of prophecy and declared that what the floods of this spring season did not wash away the winds would blow away. It verily seems as if he was under some kind of an "inspiration." We have not suffered, of course, as has your own section of beautiful and fertile country, but we have seen but very few days of sunshine since the coming of the new year. The constant rains have been seriously damaging almost everywhere, and the farmers are further behind in the preparation of their lands than for several years. March made her debut in the midst of thunder and lightning and storm and hail. But neither clouds nor wind nor rain have hindered the progress of the gospel. In many directions we hear of increased attendance upon the preached word, some gracious revivals already begun and a general expectation of a season of unusual awakening. Our people everywhere throughout the State are already deeply interested in the approaching session of the General Conference and many, I know, who are praying regularly in their closets that God would guide in all that is done. This is, above everything else, what the Conference needs. If the delegates at Nashville represent a praying church, and themselves come up under the influence of a fresh baptism of the Holy Ghost, we shall, this year, be spared everything that would cause us shame, and the many and difficult problems will find, if not an easy, a correct solution. We deeply mourn the departure of beloved and gifted Bishop Wightman. No man ever gave more general satisfaction as the presiding officer of our Conference. He was a model bishop. Will our Episcopal college ever have such a trio again as our now sainted Marvin and Doggett and Wightman? Yes. As hard as it will be to fill their places we have faith enough to believe that out of a great church full of cultivated, consecrated holy men, God will raise up their successors in every way worthy to wear their mantles.

The Southern District Sunday-school Convention closed on Wednesday night, 1st inst., its session in Atlanta. It was composed of delegates from the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, South Carolina and North Carolina. Its object was to promote the cause of organized inter-denominational Sunday-school work. Several distinguished workers were present from the North and West, among them Mr. B. F. Jacobs, of Chicago, and Mr. E. Peyson Porter, of Philadelphia, both officers of the International organization. The exercises were of the most interesting character, and the power of the Holy Ghost rested upon the Convention from the opening to the closing service. A thrilling scene occurred on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Jacobs delivered an address upon the necessity for more aggressive work on the part of the church in this field. It was masterly and crowned with divine unction. I have scarcely seen any audience more moved. At the close Governor Colquitt sprang from his seat, his eyes streaming with tears and his soul flooded with powerful emotion, to return thanks for the brother's speech and visit. They met in the aisle, grasped hands and embraced one another. The effect was electrical. A mighty wave rolled over the assembly. Several shouted aloud for joy, while from every tongue the melody of that soul-inspiring song, "Gather in the golden sheaves," went swelling up to heaven. The delegates will doubtless return to their homes with a new zeal, and this divine sowing yield in the early coming days a glorious harvest.

Dr. Edwards, in the Theological and Homiletical Monthly, draws quite a gloomy picture of the future of our denominational colleges under the overshadowing influence of richly endowed universities. I am indeed sorry if our church colleges in other States have such a discouraging outlook. But here in Georgia, at least, it is not "a bootless game for the colleges to try to compete with universities." Emory College is the joy and pride of all our people. Within forty miles of the State University, which is richly endowed by larger annual appropriations, and where education is free, she has almost twice as many students—there being now two hundred and forty-nine upon the roll. This is a success far beyond that of her palmiest ante bellum days. But then Emory College has Dr. Haygood for president. But I must hold my pen.

W. W. WADSWORTH.

NEWMAN, GA., March 2, 1882.

Eulogy on Garfield.

The following is the conclusion of Mr. Blaine's eulogy on Garfield, delivered before Congress in the hall of the House of Representatives, Washington, February 27:

On the morning of Saturday, July 2, the President was a contented and happy man—not in an ordinary degree, but joyfully, almost boyishly happy. On his way to the railroad station to which he drove slowly, in conscious enjoyment of the beautiful morning, with an unwonted sense of leisure and a keen anticipation of pleasure, his talk was all in the grateful and gratulatory vein. He felt that after four months of trial his administration was strong in its grasp of affairs, strong in popular favor, and destined to grow stronger; that grave difficulties confronting him at his inauguration had been safely passed; that trouble lay behind him and not before him; that he was soon to meet the wife whom he loved, now recovering from an illness which had but lately disquieted and at times almost unnerved him; that he was going to his alma mater to renew the most cherished associations of his young manhood, and to exchange greetings with those whose deepening interest had followed every step of his upward progress from the day he entered upon his college course until he had attained the loftiest elevation in the gift of his countrymen.

Surely if happiness can ever come from the honors or triumphs of this world, on that quiet July morning James A. Garfield may well have been a happy man. No foreboding of evil haunted him; no slightest premonition of danger clouded his sky. His terrible fate was upon him in an instant. One moment he stood erect, strong, confident in the years stretching peacefully out before him. The next he lay wounded, bleeding, helpless, doomed to weary weeks of torture, to silence, and the grave.

Great in life, he was surpassingly great in death. For no cause, in the very frenzy of wantonness and wickedness, by the red hand of murder, he was thrust from the full tide of this world's interest, from its hopes, its aspirations, its victories, into the visible presence of death—and he did not quail. Not alone for the short moment in which, stunned and dazed, he could give up life, hardly aware of its relinquishment, but through days of deadly languor, through weeks of agony, that was not less agony because silently borne, with clear sight and calm courage, he looked into his open grave. What blight and ruin met his anguished eyes, whose lips may tell what brilliant, broken plans, what battled, high ambitions, what sundering of strong, warm, manhood's friendships, what bitter rending of sweet household ties! Behind him a proud, expectant nation, a great host of sustaining friends, a cherished and happy mother, wearing the full, rich honors of her early toil and tears; the wife of his youth, whose whole life lay in his; the little boys not yet emerged from childhood's day of frolic; the fair, young daughter; the sturdy sons just springing into closest companionship, claiming every day and every day renewing a father's love and care; and in his heart the eager, rejoicing power to meet all demands. Before him, desolation and great darkness! And his soul was not shaken. His countrymen were thrilled with instant, profound and universal sympathy. Masterful in his mortal weakness, he became the centre of a nation's love, enshrined in the prayers of a world. But all the love and all the sympathy could not share with him his suffering. He trod the wine press alone. With unfaltering front he faced death. With unfailing tenderness he took leave of life. Above the demoniac hiss of the assassin's bullet he heard the voice of God. With simple resignation he bowed to the Divine decree.

As the end drew near his early craving for the sea returned. The stately mansion of power had been to him the wearisome hospital of pain, and he begged to be taken from its prison walls, from its oppressive, stifling air, from its homelessness and its hopelessness. Gently, silently, the love of a great people bore the pale sufferer to the longed-for healing of the sea, to live or to die, as God should will, within sight of its heaving billows, within sound of its manifold voices. With wan, feverect face tenderly lifted to the cooling breeze, he looked out wistfully upon the ocean's changing wonders; on its far sails, whitening in the morning light; on its restless waves, rolling shoreward to break and die beneath the noonday sun; on the red clouds of evening, arching low to the horizon; on the serene and shining pathway of the stars. Let us think that his dying eyes read a mystic meaning which only the rapt and parting soul may know. Let us believe that in the silence of the receding world he heard the great waves breaking on a further shore, and felt already upon his wasted brow the breath of the eternal morning.

Good Words.

Not a flower
But shows some touch, in freckle, streak, or stain,
Of his fair hand's live pencil. He inspires
Their balmy odors, and imparts their hues,
And bathes their eyes with nectar, and includes
In grains as countless as the seaside sands,
The forms with which he sprinkles all the earth.
Happy who walks with him! whom, what he finds
Of favor or of scent in fruit or flower,
Or what he sees of beautiful or grand
In nature, from the broad majestic oak
To the green blade that twinkles in the sun,
Prompts with replenishrance of a present God.
—Cowper.

THE FULLNESS OF CHRIST.—God has light for all dark lives, patience with all wayward souls, pity for all men who are distressed; teaching—easy, gradual teaching for all who will learn; a place and a welcome for outcasts; forgiveness even for those long impenitent; work which he will trust even to those who have long been untrustworthy; riches for poor souls, strength for weak souls, love which can kindle love even in the unloving; and all these he has in his son.

—Cloudy days are many; bright days are few. We must catch each ray of sunshine as it comes. The clouds gather, and as they roll they hide the distant shores from our sight. The clouds that hide our future never lift, blessed shadow! Who would wish to see one step along the way? An unseen hand will guide us safely to the other side, if we take firm hold and cast our care on him. It is better to trust than to see.—Payson.

—We seem to live in great peace and serenity of mind, when things are done according to our own will and opinions, but if things happen otherwise, then are we straightway moved and much vexed. Let us therefore humble our souls under the hand of God in all temptations and tribulations, for by them is man proved. Thomas a Kempis.

The tree will not only be as it falls, but will fall as it leans. And the great question every one should bring home to himself, is, What is the inclination of my soul? Does it, with all its affections and powers, lean toward God, or away from him?

—Without the way, there is no going; without the truth, there is no knowing; without the life, there is no living. Christ is the way which thou oughtest to follow; the truth which thou oughtest to trust; the life which thou oughtest to hope for.

Perfect happiness, I believe, was never intended by the Deity to be the lot of one of his creatures in this world; but that he has very much put in our power the nearness of our approaches to it is what I have steadfastly believed. Jefferson.

The greater your wants, the greater God's goodness in supplying them; the greater your enemies, the greater the display of God's power in subduing them; and the greater your unworthiness, the greater his grace in saving you.

Joining in the amusements of others is, in our social state, the next thing to sympathy in their distresses, and even the slenderest band that holds society together should rather be strengthened than snapt.—Landor.

I love to think that we are here for a little while, with precious opportunities of saving souls, which may hereafter add to our harvest of joy and glory. I never find lack of work to be done in the Lord's vineyard.—Adelaide Newton.

CONSECRATION HYMN.

BY FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to thee;
Take my hands, and let them move
At the impulse of thy love.
Take my feet, and let them be
Swift and beautiful for thee.

Take my voice, and let it sing
Always only for my King.
Take my lips, and let them be Filled with messages from thee.
Take my silver and my gold,
Not a mite would I withhold.

Take my moments and my days,
Let them flow in endless praise.
Take my intellect, and use
All my powers as thou mayst choose.
Take my will, it shall be thine
It shall be no longer mine.

Take my heart, it is thine own—
It shall be thy living throne.
Take my love. O Lord, I pour
At thy feet its treasure store.
Take myself, and let me be
Ever only all for thee.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1882.—MARK v. 1-10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil."—1 John iii, 8.

POWER OVER EVIL SPIRITS.

1. And they came over unto the other side of the sea into the country of the Gadarenes.
2. And when he was come out of the ship, immediately there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit,
3. Who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no, not with chains;
4. Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces; neither could any man tame him.
5. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones.
6. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped him,
7. And cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the Most High God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not.
8. (For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit.)
9. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many.
10. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country.

After the tempest was stilled the disciples proceeded on their journey, and arrived in the country of the Gadarenes early in the morning. Their night's experience prepared them to witness the quelling of a greater storm than that they had just witnessed. They were in something of the same frame of mind as that Jonah experienced when he was cast up on the shore from the great fish's mouth. They, like he, had come from the jaws of destruction. The Lord has just shown himself to be the peacemaker of the storms and tumults of the outer world. But there is something more fearful and wilder than winds and waves in their fiercest mood. Even the spirit of man, when it is broken loose from all restraints, and has yielded itself to be an organ, not of God, but of him who brings utter most confusion wherever his dominion reaches. Christ has brought them to this wild and desert coast to be witnesses of a work yet mightier than stilling a tempest. He will speak, and it his potent word this insulder strife and blinder rage which is in the heart of a man will allay itself and there will be a great calm. As soon as they landed there met the Saviour coming out of the tombs—a man with an unclean spirit, not a ghost, but a veritable man, whose haunt was the deserted caves once used as tombs a frantic maniac, naked and scarred with many a wound. His case was of long standing; he had been bound with chains and fetters, but with his wild and superhuman strength had broken the fetters. No man could tame him. He had chosen this wild and unclean place, a deserted graveyard as his resort, where he roamed and cried with unearthly yells day and night, a sleepless, dangerous maniac. He saw Jesus a long way off, and came running to the Saviour, crouched at his feet, and cried with a loud voice: "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God, I adjure thee by God that thou torment me not." Christ spoke at once to the devil in the man in tones of authority: "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit." The man, with the instincts of man, was impelled by the magnetic presence of Jesus. He who draws all men to him drew this poor demoniac, and he came running, and, by the desperate need of his case, dragged the devil along. A man in the presence of Christ is always more than a match for the devil. The devil used the man's mouth and voice to utter his protest at being dragged into the very presence of his Conqueror. Like some ferocious beast submitting to the spell of human authority, he runs and crouches at the feet of Jesus, the devil using the man's organs of speech, protesting all the while. This was devil worship. The man wanted help, and with an instinct of self-preservation sought it in Jesus; the devil trying to overpower him, and hold him back, produced the paroxysm of conflict which uttered itself in loud cries. He was compelled, however, by the superhuman strength of the man to come up to the very presence of Christ, and he worshiped him. The words of address show how completely this man was enthralled by the demon spirits; he was thoroughly bedevilled, so that his own identity was inextricably confused with that of the demons in him. This devil was a stout redoubtable giant, six thousand strong, a demon for every fibre, every nerve, every muscle in the man's body. He delayed to obey, and argues the case with the Prince. "I adjure thee by God that you torment me not. This was not profanity, but a plausible argument, about the best and only one he could bring. I implore you to treat us no worse than God, your Father; deal with us as he does. Do not precipitate our final doom, but prolong the respite we now enjoy; do not send us out of the country; do not banish us to the pit. Christ permits the delay, and asks a question, not for the devil's sake so much as for the man's. To have brought the devil out of him by sudden force would have been to have taken the man's life; but the Master, with consummate skill, gains a little hint by a few questions. What is thy name? The man answers, at the devil's suggestion, "Legion," for we are many. No doubt the man struggled to think of his family name, but the devil was too quick for him, and substituted his own, and tried, by the very name, to further confuse him. "We are legion;" that is, I-and man; we are many. There is no more natural way of awakening a man who is beside himself to the consciousness of his own personal identity than to make him tell his own name. This was the Saviour's object in this question, and in this permitted delay. The first condition for this man's cure was to bring him back to a distinct realization of his own personality. The man was asked, but the demon answered, showing how entire was his mastery over him. The demon earnestly besought him that he would not send him away out of the country. Now, there was near by a great herd of swine feeding, and the demons asked that they might be permitted to enter into the swine. Why should devils want to enter these swine? We answer why should they not. Maybe they would rather play a small game than none. They love to produce ruin; they know of no better way of setting the Gadarenes against the Saviour than by destroying their property; the loss of their herds would go far to neutralize the greatness of the work done for this man by the minds of these losers. The Master permitted them; the devil can not enter even a hog without permission. Why should the Lord permit this destruction of these innocent brutes? Because he needed this very ocular demonstration to convince the demoniac of the departure of the devils from himself. When he heard the word given, and saw the effect of the demons on the swine, he had ocular proof that the devils had left him. A human spirit is worth more than twice two thousand swine. We notice three prayers made to the Saviour; two are granted and one is refused.

The devils' prayer he answered just as they made it, and the result was just what they feared; they were driven to the abyssmal deep, which they so dreaded. They overreached themselves in their prayers. These Gadarenes, who suffered the loss, came out and formally asked the Saviour to depart off their coasts. The Master did, and we never hear of his returning to Gadara. This prayer is offered by many a selfish covetous people by starving out their preacher. Men calculate just how much they can afford to lose by the gospel, and, when that is reached, they are ready to offer the prayer of the Gadarenes, and, as a usual thing, God answers them.

The healed man prayed him that he might be with him. Was he fearful that the demons would come back, and felt only safe in the Master's presence? or did he, out of gratitude, wish to be a follower of him to whom he owed this mighty benefit? Whatever his motive, Jesus suffered him not, but told him to go home to his friends, and tell how great things the Lord had done for him, and had compassion. To be a home missionary for Christ, in regions where he was best known and so long dreaded, was a far nobler calling than going where nobody ever heard of him. We all ought to be missionaries in this sense. The healed man became a preacher in regions where Christ was rejected, and could not come. His message was his own experience. If we are ever saved we must be such a preacher. The Saviour has a right to expect that we will tell to our friends this divine experience, and reproduce it in other souls. We must do something more than go to church and prayer meeting. Something more than sit at the feet of Jesus. We have thousands among our good church members, who enjoy intensely the church and her solemn services, who, in the great day of his coming, will be dismissed as unprofitable servants, as foolish virgins shut out from the marriage feast.

Burning of Dr. Linfield's House.

MR. EDITOR: By way of answering numerous letters of inquiry concerning our misfortune and disaster, and for the enlightenment of many friends who probably feel anxious to hear of us, lest some should be misled or a wrong impression conveyed, I beg an excuse for obtruding a short letter on the ADVOCATE. The story has several editions out, and some of them none the better for little or much revision.

About the origin of the fire supposition and suspicion have refused to agree. I think the idea of an incendiary is somewhat unnecessary. From a woman's standpoint, there is so much wickedness inside of a saloon, and those outside, who are inimical to the institutions, are those who come nearest the possession of unimpeachable character.

The owner of the establishment is reported to have been intoxicated when he left on the twelve o'clock train for "Mardi Gras." The fire broke out about two hours after he left, and from the fact that he had considerably over a hundred dollars in silver melted, we conclude he was careless about his fire or lamp. Three saloons went up, and all who felt the need of "a little toddy" had enough for once.

We considered burning an almost inevitable fate for our home, and had frequently arranged how and what we should do in such an event. Strange to say, we carried out the planning almost to the letter. Thanks to our apprenticeship to the itinerancy, we all were expert at packing, and the putting away hurriedly of many things would have done credit to the preacher who has moved, on an average, every two years.

I presume that the experience of getting my father's books down stairs will be remembered by two of us till the day we "lay down this mortal coil." The saddest and most deplorable loss of all comes in right here. We either lost or misplaced my father's sermons. Six hundred and sixteen of them were tied in two packages on top of his book case; some of them were saved from the burning at Alexandria during the war. I do not know that they would have done for publication, for they were principally notes. I looked over them a few weeks since, and so many of them I recognized and could almost elaborate from memory the mighty truths that those little notes contained. Each sermon had its three hymns and two reading lessons marked on the outside leaf. His diary was burned also, and now we have him alone, a wreck, left to us of all that he was and all that we thought him. Surely he will "only be remembered by what he has done."

The night of the fire two gentlemen almost carried him to the house of the Presbyterian minister as the nearest place of safety. He had been quite unwell for a week or two, and had been unable to walk. As he went out he asked if the house was on fire. He seemed very much fatigued when he reached the house, but has not realized any change in his home.

With the assistance of the good people of Hazlehurst we were enabled to save most of our household effects. I mean those in use. Occasionally in straightening in our new home we missed a part of different pieces of furniture; the contents of the kitchen were all demolished.

Although the house was insured, there were numberless little conveniences that could never be replaced by the money, and the difference in living in a rented house and one's own is perceptible, though this one is a very nice roomy house.

In looking back we consider ourselves not altogether unfortunate; the weather was not cold, and we were all well. In answer to an oft-repeated prayer around our hearth, we were aroused in time of sudden calamity, and not overly excited. We ponder heartfelt thanks to a kind Providence, who has led us out of all our calamities with his own mighty hand, and raised up friends to us in time of need. To every one who assisted us in any way we are very grateful. To the ladies of Hazlehurst we feel that we are under many obligations. They assisted nobly. Whoever deprecates woman's help will never know what a power she is in distress calls her out, and I hope he will not gain the knowledge through the experience of a fire. Dr. Johnson and his sweet wife came up Sunday evening, and gladdened us with words of cheer and a kindly remembrance from our friends in Brookhaven.

Very respectfully,

A. E. LINFIELD.

From the Work.

RAYMOND, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: I have three regular preaching places: the highly classic and goodly old towns of Raymond and Clinton, and the new, busy, bustling Bolton. Of course the circumjacent country receives all the pastoral service one little preacher, with "quite a family," can bestow. At the points named I try to hold forth the word of life, morning and night, on the regular days of each. Our church buildings are full large "for the times," each having seating capacity for three or four hundred. Probably no other circuit has all its churches more nearly of a size or more similarly equipped. The pulpits are all of nearly equal height and common sense simplicity. All warmed with stoves, and lighted with coal oil in chandeliers. In each there sits convenient to the pulpit a neat cabinet organ. No organized choir, but faithful leaders of the music are always present, and prepared to act. When tunes are familiar (and this is the rule) congregational singing is good—what there is of it. A distressing fact is that our people, in the general, can not or will not sing. Who will revive us in this important means of grace? At each church a Methodist Sunday school, with literature corresponding, meets at half-past nine o'clock A. M. Sunday mornings. Separate Boards of Trustees, of seven members, are organized, with president and secretary, to discharge functions contemplated by our [illegible] our last Quarterly Conference for 1881 there was a written report from each board, covering the matters named in the Discipline, and some others suggested by circumstances, e. g., the fact of title to property being properly recorded, and exactly where record is to be found. Such a course, constantly pursued, would obviate much of the vexations and uncertainty that troubles our people at times. This was a pleasing surprise to our painstaking, thoroughly methodistic presiding elder. We wish him "many happy returns."

Seven stewards serve our tables. The board is at last organized. Its president has served officially in our church for about forty or fifty years, and most of the time at Raymond. Each society has a sub-secretary to keep its own account. Our church Conferences are increasing in attendance, and interest manifest. Some elect ladies ably assist the stewards. At our first Quarterly Conference for 1882 a steward from each society was present to represent its ability and willingness in making and apportioning the assessment for preacher in charge.

Here is a fact specially interesting to you, Mr. Editor, and to our excellent publisher. Nearly every Methodist family within our rounds takes our own home organ or the central church organ of Nashville—chiefly the former. Our dear ADVOCATE has a warm place in many hearts among us—the "Orleans one." The editors are appreciated as well as "the funny man." The Alabama sister ought to look up the publisher's column if she wishes to "e'en a'most die laughing" every week. Notwithstanding, we would thank the "colporteur" for a few more "wild cats," and as many circuses of the kind he gave, with the moral attached.

Our "Nashville one" is pungent and powerful on many important themes. It receives warm commendation from the same class, who best appreciate the other, to-wit: the most intelligent and pious among us. I canvass for the Central in a way that does not displace a single one of our "home institution." A few take both. Some take the Nashville who have ready access to the Orleans, and by mutual exchange a double benefit is derived, and both our great periodicals are helped. Both become more and more to me a necessary luxury. From the foregoing it is easily inferred that our people are generally law-abiding members. Some are ripe, spiritual Christians. These are a comfort and stay to their pastor.

Much sickness has prevailed for six months—mostly of typhoid types—and some still lingers through the warm, wet winter. Some dear ones have been gathered home.

We much desired to say something just now about bolting, beginning at the end nearest home, and especially because we have some fresh, pleasant things to say. But I forbear pro tem.

Yours, J. P. DRAKE.

MOVING TO A NEW CHARGE.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent's, J. P.'s, trip to Conference and back, in some respects, was serious, and yet rather droll in some other respects. For instance, when that lady had such a pity for that "little old man," and "wanted to carry him." Mrs. B. and I were full of merriment at the idea. I just thought if she had undertaken it she would have received more than she contracted for, as you know little men are proverbial for temper.

Well, I had a troublesome trip too, not to Conference and back, but from the west to the east, in search of "not more light," but the town of Bastrop, and, lo! I've found it.

When a postal from New Orleans told me of my destiny for this year I did not stop to confer with flesh and blood, nor wait for sunshine and flowers. I advertised a sale, and sold, and commenced my journey on the same day of the sale, making nearly nine miles, with wife and children, through the rain. They were in an uncovered wagon, and I behind in the saddle. At Minden we stopped to perfect our arrangements, and then we delayed not to hasten to our new field of labor. But we had no proper idea of what lay before us. For instance, when two miles of Homer a spindle snapped off at half-past six P. M. There we were, in a huge mud, not hole, but center, and in the dark, with wife and five children, and not a white man's house between that broken spindle and town. Well, we all reached town that night, and so did the broken wagon.

It is a shame that our State has no good roads in the winter, and no good system of working roads. Sometimes men are called out, and sometimes they are not. When they work; every one works as little as possible, and does bad work at that, and does it his own way; does it (the work) under protest, and gets away as soon after dinner as possible. Then the first heavy rain that comes washes away the bad work, and leaves the bad road as bad as ever, or it may be worse. I write of this matter in a general way. When our roads are worked by contract things will be different as to travel.

I do not propose to make my story long. Let it be sufficient to say that at the end of eight days we rolled our four muddy wheels into Bastrop for the first time in all our lives. We stopped at the hotel, by the advice of one of the brethren, as the parsonage was not in a state to be then possessed or even desired.

Next morning we left the hotel in the rain, and plodded on through mud and water, and soon reached the long-looked for. But, "O my!" we were the first there and the last that day. True, a stranger friend sent us our dinner by an old colored man. Well, we went in and formally took possession, made a fire, and went to work in right good earnest to fix up or arrange the few things we found.

Mr. Editor, we are here still, and we are here to accomplish one great work—to save souls by the gospel of Jesus; first by our example, and then [illegible] our earnest precept; hence our selling out, sacrifice and exposure. May we succeed. We think that when we get acquainted with our people here everything will be righted, for they have a good name abroad.

JOS. E. BRADLEY.

BASTROP, LA., Feb. 17, 1882.

YAZOO CITY, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: From the name we bear one would conclude that we were a place of great importance, and such we are, too, at least to a few of the dwellers on this big earth of ours. We have a population, in round numbers, of 2,500, according to the last census, which catalogues us sixth in the list of towns and cities in our State. Our name, too, is very appropriate, as this is the only town of any size in the Yazoo valley. Here centers a large trade from the surrounding country, both hills and bottoms. It is certainly one of the most energetic, enterprising places in the State, and the neatest, most perfectly kept little city I have ever known, not even the larger places in the State equaling us in that respect. Our streets are nearly or quite all well gravelled, which insures them against mud, and the sidewalks, where not bricked, are neatly paved with planks. In truth, the whole town, from private yards to public enterprises, puts on an appearance of thrift and neatness. All the principal denominations are represented—some strong, some weak. Ours is said to be the largest membership of the Protestants. I am not sufficiently acquainted yet to report on that feature. One thing I can testify is that, despite the incessant bad weather since our arrival, our congregations are very full and encouraging. We hope for "souls" and "seals" this year. While we can not boast with Bro. G., from the hub of the State, we can very safely say the preacher is provided for, and has no fears for the future. Much, very much, work lies out before me, but where is the field that does not call loudly for a spirit of work and prayer? I find a number of the ADVOCATES among my people, though not all are subscribers by any means. I hope to improve this feature. Bro. Abbey, as you know, lives near us, but the back water which shuts us in on our river side has deprived us of seeing him for some time. As he says, the almanac maker's would make him old, but really he looks as ruddy and strong as twenty years ago. I imagine he is preparing another of those things—"the making of many of which there is no end." Bro. Hunnicutt, presiding elder, is to be with us in two weeks. O! what pleasure is the coming of the elder to the weary pastor.

By a recent act of our Legislature granting a charter (satisfactory) we are in high hopes of railroad communication, direct with your city, in a very short while. Our people are very sanguine, and expect, with your city at one end and Yazoo City at this end, to keep up a very lively business. So mote it be.

C. B. HOLLOMAN.

FEBRUARY 21, 1882.

CAYUGA CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Our first Quarterly Conference for Cayuga circuit was held at Utica, February 11-12. On Sabbath Bro. Woodward, our presiding elder, preached to a congregation composed of Methodists, Baptists, Campbellites and Presbyterians, on "The Fatherhood of God," and I think that denominational differences sank into insignificance with every thinking mind compared with the spiritual union between the great Father and the Christian heart. He asked for $13 for Bishops, and received $9, which was a fair beginning. Our preacher is with us this year, is heartily welcomed, and seems to be taking hold in good earnest. Our preacher is in the parsonage, and if we do not succeed in moving it to Utica, the place it should properly be, we expect to carry on the improvement of it as we intended last year when it was left vacant on our hands. We have heard much said on the Confederacy door toward urging preachers to establish parsonages on circuits, which is all right; but, again, when established they should be occupied in, order to keep them up. Let us have district parsonages also.

Obituaries.

GRAHAM.—MARY H. GRAHAM was born in Green county, Ga., July 24, 1808, died in Butler county, Ala., February 10, 1882. At ten or eleven years of age she moved with her parents, Joseph and Nancy Browning, to Lowndes county, Ala. In 1825 she was married to Samuel N. Graham. A short time after her marriage she found peace with God and joined the Presbyterian Church, of which her husband was then a member. In after years her husband became a minister in the Methodist Protestant Church. Into this church his good wife followed and aided him to the best of her ability in the duties and labors that pertained to his office as an embassador of Christ. With much patience and Christian fortitude she endured the trials and privations incident to her position as the wife of a preacher of the glad tidings of salvation. About two years ago Bro. Graham, the aged and faithful laborer in the vineyard of his Lord, closed his mission on earth and entered into the rest of the saints, and now she whom he left behind, the companion of his youth and the sharer of his joys and of his griefs, has just followed him on to the spirit land. What a happy meeting beyond the shores of time!

It was my good fortune as her pastor to visit this deeply afflicted sister from time to time during her protracted illness, and a more patient, resigned and unmurmuring Christian I have not found. If any of the saints of God were ever made perfect through suffering, surely this mother in Israel was. After lingering a long while under one of the most terrible diseases flesh is heir to—the cancer—she died in great peace and ceased to suffer.

God is gathering his dear children home every day and among the redeemed ones he has gathered good old sister Graham. She was the mother of ten children, six of whom have passed to the other shore and the remaining four are to follow on.

MASON—LOUINDA PREWETT was born in Opelousas, La., July 25, 1816, and was married to William Mason, January 6, 1833, and died at the same place, January 18, 1882, aged 65 years, 5 months and 24 days. Her beloved husband, Bro. William Mason, was an active and efficient member of our church for forty years. He was, from time to time, steward, trustee, and always sexton. This last office he took upon himself that he might keep the church neat and clean. He was not ashamed to fill the smallest office of the church, and did not hesitate to fill the most responsible. He could truly say: "I would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." Bro. Mason died full of years and of faith, February 4, 1879.

His beloved wife "Aunie Mason," as all called her, continued in the office of sexton until her death. She was beloved by all, Roman Catholics and Protestants, white and colored, lamented her death. Sister Mason joined the Methodist Church when about sixteen years of age, and continued a faithful and devoted member thereof until her death. Sister Mason was a ripe scholar, a good neighbor and a devoted Christian.

Thus the dear old landmarks are passing away. We have a large number of grey-haired veterans in our church at this place. They are to us a constant blessing. Soon, too, they will pass over the river to meet those with whom they have communed below. What they are to do for the church must be done at once. We pray their mantles may fall on the younger members. Farewell "Auntie Mason" until we meet where sickness, sorrow, pain and death are felt and feared no more. Her pastor,

THOMAS J. HOUGH.

JOHNSON.—MRS. MOLLIE E. JOHNSON, wife of H. A. Johnson, was born in Madison county, Miss., March 17, 1858, and died in Hinds county, Miss., February 6, 1882.

She joined the Episcopal Church while quite young and remained a member of that Church until 1879 or 1880 when she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Wesley Chapel, Madison circuit. She was a consistent Christian in her life, and a happy and triumphant one in death. She was the picture of good health and bid as fair for a long life as any one I ever knew, and I remarked upon hearing of her death that if the whole community were appointed a committee to say who would be likely to die first in that community, they would most likely have fixed upon her the last one. There had been in her family and the neighborhood several cases of typho-malarial fever. She said to her husband, "If I take it every I cannot stand it," and from the moment she took it she said this sickness is unto death. Truly, there is gloom in this once happy family. No domestic infelicity or trouble had ever darkened their door, and they were as happy a couple as I ever saw. Three little boys and their father mourn her loss.

She said she did not fear to die, she did not dread the future, said she would be saved, but she was anxious to live to bless her husband and raise her children unto the Lord. She loved the Church and her pastors and the itinerant always met with a warm welcome at her home. Dear friend, sister, mother, wife, we all miss thee, and though we cannot have thee back we can go to thee. "Death to us, to thee is gain." May our God, who doeth all things well, take care of the little ones and comfort the husband and friends.

P. A. JOHNSTON.

CHERRY.—CHARLES L. CHERRY was born at Mount Pleasant, Monroe county, Ala., he died at Mobile, December 28, 1881. He was raised in Mobile and attended with his mother the Presbyterian Church. In 1878 he was married to Miss Cecilia Mitchell and soon after both joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, during a revival of religion at the St. Francis street charge, Mobile, while Dr. Hamilton was pastor.

The silence that followed the announcement, "Cousin Charlie is dead!" told more eloquently than words how sadly it fell on our hearts, how deeply we lamented his departure, how sincerely we sympathized with the sorrowing wife and child, for Charlie had a loving heart and a loving way of winning other hearts. Kind and devoted as a father and husband, noble and true as a friend, "pure and peaceable" as a Christian. As he lived so he died—happy.

During his first illness, which was long and painful, he manifested rare Christian courage, trust, patience and fortitude, expressed no fear of the "dark valley" and at the last seemed wholly resigned and told his friends and the attending physician and minister that he "was willing to trust in Jesus." He loved to hear them sing the hymn, "Simply trusting every day."

In a letter the bereaved widow writes: "Only a few moments before he died he prayed so earnestly and tenderly then drew the cover over his face that we might not see the last struggle." But there was no struggle. He gently passed away in that blessed sleep. "From which none ever wake to weep." Sad was the parting but joyous will the meeting be "in the sweet by-and-by."

MRS. L. C. SADLER.

DOTY.—How little many of our people appreciate the pure example of a noble Christian woman, reared with the rigors of life in the every day household duties, and yet possessing an amiable disposition, always kind and ready to help those in trouble; cheerful in hours of grief and often sad disappointment in host and children.

We have no higher type of Christian perfection and beauty of character, this side of Christ, than that of a noble woman. Our community has been bereft of this beautiful Christian example in the death of sister M. C. DOTY. On the twelfth day of August last calmly and peacefully she departed this life.

She was one of our oldest citizens having been in the county about forty years. She was born in Wilmington N. C., in 1819, married to Mr. Doty in 1837, some thereafter joined the church, moved to Holmes county, Miss., and settled at Richland. If any one was known she certainly was, and all the people say, "What a good woman has gone." Her life was most favorably commented on by the old family servants who were probably in the best situation to know the secret and home life of a woman. She leaves one beveled daughter to mourn her loss. But she sorrows not as those who have no hope. Her mother has gone to the "many mansions above," and she is pressing toward the mark for the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus.

"HE CARETH."

BY MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

What can it mean? Is it aught to him
That the nights are long and the days are dim?
Can he be touched by the griefs I bear
Which sadden the heart and whiten the hair?
About his throne are eternal calms,
And strong, glad music of happy psalms,
And bliss, unruffled by any strife—
How can he care for my little life?

And yet I want him to care for me
While I live in this world where the sorrows be!
When the lights die down from the path I take,
When strength is feeble, and friends forsake,
When love and music that once did bless
Have left me to silence and loneliness,
And my life-song changes to sobbing prayers—
Then my heart cries out for a God who cares.

When shadows hang over the whole day long,
And my spirit is bowed with shame and wrong,
When I am not good, and the deeper shade
Of conscious sin makes my heart afraid,
And the busy world has too much to do
To stay in its courses to help me through,
And I long for a Saviour—can it be
That the God of the universe cares for me?

Oh, wonderful story of deathless love!
Each child is dear to that heart above;
He fights for me when I can not fight,
He comforts me in the gloom of night,
He lifts the burden, for he is strong,
He stills the sigh, and awakes the song;
The sorrow that bowed me down he bears,
And loves and pardons because he cares!

Let all who are sad take heart again.
We are not alone in our hours of pain;
Our Father stoops from his throne above
To soothe and quiet us with his love;
He leaves not when the storm is high,
And we have safety, for he is nigh.
Can it be trouble which he doth share?
Oh, rest in peace, for the Lord will care!

Life's Three Volumes.

Bishop McTyeire at Elm Street, Nashville, New Year's Day.)

Bishop H. N. McTyeire preached to a large audience at the Elm Street Methodist Church yesterday morning. He chose as his text Psalm xix, 14: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my Redeemer."

Many, perhaps, had made this their prayer to-day. Our sins have been so many in the past year, they say, we are now going to turn over a new leaf, and watch over ourselves this year. This was a good purpose. He was not one of those who say it is better not to make new resolutions than to make and break them. He would call upon them to make new resolutions.

Most lives were written in one volume. But before God the life of every one was written in three—the volume of works, the volume of words, the volume of thoughts. The first is the smallest, that of words is the next, but the volume of the thoughts is the most bulky of all. Most people would acknowledge our works a proper subject for judgment. The civil law lays peculiar stress on them.

Some men hate sin because it brings dishonor. A man that dreads it on this account has no reason to believe that he is regenerate. But if one is concerned about his meditation there is reason to believe that he is a converted man.

A man's words during the day were many, but how few compared with the volume of his thoughts.

Unkind words, untrue words, uncharitable words, words that are tipped with malice, words that no civil jury would take notice of, will be condemned by the Lord. David said, "I will set a watch at the door of my mouth." There is a class of monks who take a vow never to speak. Many people in the world appear to be getting ready to join them. There is a quality of human speech that wounds—even more, that corrupts. O, the power of speech to encourage, to lift up, to heal or discourage, to lower, to wound.

He would not discourage the delights of genial society. When he told them to speak the truth he would not have them morbid. He knew a man in whose society he found no pleasure on account of his morbidness. He was so afraid of telling a lie that he never spoke the truth. He would qualify and qualify till there was nothing left of his statements.

There were many kinds of sins of the tongue. He hoped that in the year to come this volume would have nothing in it to blot out.

But where we speak once we think a hundred times. He had always thought that a bold exclamation of David: "Lord, consider the meditation of my heart." "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," says Solomon. It is the thoughts in which the character finally hides itself. A man may stand still as to action and be silent as to words, but that portentous volume is being filled with his thoughts. Though his hand and tongue are still, yet his thoughts move on. Here God is the judge where man is not. Here the divine law surpasses the human. No law of man ever intruded into the domains of the heart, but the all-seeing eye of God penetrates and reads all that is there. If the fountain be pure, words and deeds follow like it. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." "But," says one, "I started out with good intentions, but before I crossed the threshold I had broken my resolutions." Many say that on the days wherein they made their resolves they did worst. The cause of their failure was that they said, "I will." God leaves them to themselves that he may show them what they are—how weak and helpless, and good-for-nothing. We should pray, "Lord, be thou my strength." We should not despair when we have the Almighty for a helper. It didn't matter how many failures they made. He saw the skeleton lining his course all the way back. In the night, when all is still, the heart's meditations were all spread. Then we should pray in the language of the text. It was not altogether a fancy of that philosopher who thought that the opening of the book in Revelation was a figure for the quickening of the memory, when all would see their whole past, before them and recognize the justice of God's judgment. Reminiscences of Bishop Andrew.

BY R. H. RIVERS, D. D.

I was intimately associated with Bishop Andrew during the four years of war. A part of the time I was his pastor at Summerfield, Ala., and all the time his neighbor. No man ever had the confidence of the whole community more than had the Bishop. He was beloved and honored as an apostle in goodness, and a very Solomon in wisdom. He encouraged and blessed us all by his fatherly counsels and tender sympathy.

For months we had prayer meeting every afternoon, and he was nearly always present to give a word of encouragement and offer prayer. He was powerful in prayer. He talked with God as a son with a father.

When Selma fell we could hear the guns and as they suddenly ceased we were sure that our troops had yielded to the power of numbers, and that many of our old citizens were either killed or captured. Soon the news came of the victory of Wilson's raiders. Our people, mostly women and children, were filled with dismay. Sister Andrew insisted that the Bishop should go out into Perry county and hide until all danger was passed. He did so when the following incident occurred, which I will give you as nearly as possible in his own language.

"I went," said the Bishop, "at the earnest solicitation of my wife who feared that it might fare hard with me if I should meet the raiders. This fear was founded on the fact that my name had been so prominently connected with the division of the Church. I found a warm welcome from Sister Connerly. Her home was safe to go at night, but during the day I had to hide in the neighboring forest. I had as a companion a venerable, pious layman from Greensboro. So soon as breakfast was over, Sister Connerly would fix us a lunch and we would go to the woods, where we would remain until we saw the yankee soldiers returning to their headquarters at Selma. This they usually did about sunset. On the second or third day my friend and myself put out as usual, and found a beautiful cluster of pine trees and bushes, among which we took shelter. We had not been there but a few moments before I became intensely uneasy, and proposed to change our hiding place for one more secure. My friend positively refused to make any change. So I went alone, and soon found another thicker cluster of pines which pleased me much better. Here I remained during the day. I could often see the Federal soldiers going two and two together, and often only a few yards from the thicket in which I had stored myself away. While thus employed, and often looking to God in prayer, I heard the shrill sound of a rifle in the direction of the hiding place of my good lay brother. After sunset, as usual, I set off on my return to the hospitable home of my good Sister Connerly. On my way I concluded to step and secure the company of my old friend. I approached his hiding place and called. He did not answer. I entered the thicket. There he lay, a corpse, pierced by a bullet from some raider's rifle. Providence had taken care of me. Had my brother taken my advice he, too, would have been saved. I am sure," said the Bishop, "that the Holy Spirit moved me to change my place to save me to the Church a while longer."

This narrative was given in a love-feast. There were tears of gratitude, and many hearts responded in sympathy with the good Bishop in his wonderful preservation. He always believed that he was preserved by a special interposition of Divine Providence. The next day after this adventure I had a call from Capt. McBurney, one of General Wilson's staff. He was a Scotchman and a gentleman. I told him the Bishop was out hiding from him and his men. He said to me: "Have him come in; there will be no danger here, but there will be a great danger where he is." I immediately communicated with Sister Andrew, and the good Bishop immediately returned to his home. We could easily send communications by the negroes, who were quite reliable messengers during the dark days of that terrible raid.

May I relate one other incident in the life of this good man?

The war was over, and I was called by filial duty to change my field of labor to West Tennessee. My last night in Summerfield was spent at Brother Tom Barker's. He was a close neighbor to the Bishop. In order to meet the train at Selma I had to leave with my family at 3 o'clock a. m. So just before three the Bishop came over to have prayer with us before we left. Nothing of the kind ever affected me more. Long before the dawn of day that aged and venerable servant of God left his comfortable bed and came to a neighbor's house to pray with his departing brother. It was the last prayer I ever heard from his lips. How it comforted me I may not say.—Wesley and Christian Advocate.

(OUR PROTECTION AGAINST METEORS.—During August and November, said an astronomer, as he stood on a house-roof watching a shower of meteors, more of these strange visitors come to the earth than at any other season of the year. "And," he added, "when they strike the earth the heat produced in consequence of their tremendous velocity runs up a million degrees or more in a second, and in a twinkling they are changed to vapor. If they could get through the atmosphere they would make it lively for us. No man could tell at what instant he might be struck down by a shot from the sky, for meteoroids are plunging into the atmosphere all the time at the rate of several millions a day for the whole earth. The soft air that fans the cheek is to most of those projectiles as impenetrable as a wall of steel. Some of them, however, are able to penetrate the earth, but they are comparatively few in number. When a meteoroid strikes the earth it is called an aerolite. No good museum of mineralogy is without one or more specimens of those black, crusted, iron-like bodies. Humboldt tells of two monks who were killed by them, one in Crete, in 1514, the other at Milan, 1650. He also relates that two Swedish sailors were killed by an aerolite on board their ship in 1674. The thatched roofs of houses have been set on fire by aerolites, and sheep and animals have been struck dead in the fields by them. Some think it was a shower of aerolites that overwhelmed the Amorites after they had been whipped by Joshua, as described in the Bible. Besides, we are no safer than our forefathers. Hardly a year passes without one or more masses of meteoric stone falling in the neighborhood of human habitations. In 1875 a German farmer was shot through the arm by a small aerolite, which made a hole like a bullet. In 1878 a boy at Hanna had a piece of his thumb chipped off by a burning stone that fell from the sky. About two years ago a boy at Paterson, New Jersey, was said to have been hit in the leg by an aerolite. His story was doubted, but I believe it was never disproved, and certainly it was not impossible. A man is in more danger of being killed by lightning than by an aerolite, but it would not be so if the air did not protect him. Scribner's

MISSIONARY.

—The Basle Mission Society has an important and prosperous mission on the Gold Coast and in Ashantee, Africa. It has eight stations and forty-one out-stations on the Gold Coast and one station in Ashantee. The number of members of the various congregations, including children, is 4,612, and the whole expenditure for 1880 was about $41,000. Last year Missionaries Buck and Huppenbauer, of Kyebi, a station at Akim, southeast of Ashantee, with eleven out-stations and 642 members of congregation, set out for an evangelistic journey through Ashantee-Akim, which is a province lying between Akim and Ashantee, across the Prah River, and through Ashantee to Kumassie, the capitol of a powerful but cruel despot. They were accompanied by three native teachers and eleven porters. The people of Ashantee-Akim, are under the fearful dominion of the king of Kumassie, and long not only for deliverance, but for enlightenment. The people of one of the towns, Amandra, some time ago sent a deputation to the coast, with money, "to buy a preacher." The missionaries were received with open arms at every place they visited in this territory. In Prison chief said, sorrowfully, that he had hoped that preachers would settle in Kumassie and bring peace to his distracted country. In Kome the people conversed with the missionaries far into the night, and never tired of hearing them sing hymns. Obegu, the largest town next to Ardandra, with a population of 15,000, gave to the missionaries a very attentive hearing, though at first the chief hid himself in fear. The people begged for a teacher to come and stay with them. A man from Asum called the missionaries out of their beds at night to tell them there were many young men in his town who were longing to be taught, and to beseech them not to pass Asum by. The country of Ashantee was recognized by the abject air of the people and the dilapidated appearance of the towns. The once flourishing Odumassie is now divided into fifteen hamlets. At Abokrankra, eighteen miles from Kumassie, the people fled to the bush on the approach of the party, and it was difficult to obtain their confidence. One woman said: "Nothing can help us but your word. We may not speak out, but you can do so even before the king. We are slaves. Even our children do not belong to us. The sheep, the fowls, the corn we raise is not ours. The king's people take anything they can lay their hands on." Between this place and the capital are thirteen villages which the missionaries visited, but the nearer they came to their destination the more reserved and frightened were the people. On entering Kumassie, they found some fetish-priests conducting a burial, which they subsequently learned was of a young girl who had been sacrificed, to prevent evil coming to the city by the presence of foreigners. Other atrocious rites were performed for the same purpose. The strangers were well received by king and people, though they seemed to distrust their guests. A public reception was held, which was attended by 5,000 soldiers and a multitude of from 50,000 to 60,000, all of whom passed in procession before the missionaries, the ceremony lasting four hours. The next day the king was asked in a public assembly, at which one of the native teachers preached, whether he would permit a teacher to reside in the capital. The king kept them waiting several days for an answer. Meantime, they preached twice a day to large audiences, when they were ready to depart the king told them that a European in Catholic priest had asked him the same question a short time before and he had answered him, therefore, he could not answer again. The missionaries were encouraged by this evasive answer. They learned that he had told the priest that his doctrine was strange and was not wanted in Ashantee. When they got back to the borders of Akim, they learned that reports had been sent to their friends in Kyebi that the native members of the company had been killed in Kumassie, and the missionaries had had their noses cut off, showing what a terrible reputation the capital has gained for bloody deeds. The missionaries hope that soon a mission may be established in that center of influence and cruelty.—N. Y. Independent.

—The "Missionary Herald" for August, the organ of the Baptist Home Missionary Society of London, contains an admirable map of the Congo, from its mouth to Stanley Pool. This society already has a mission at San Salvador, south of the Congo, between one hundred and two hundred miles from the coast. It recently sent two of its missionaries, Mr. H. E. Crudgington and Mr. W. H. Bentley, on an exploring tour to Stanley Pool for the purpose of fixing a site for a mission at the latter point. The report of their exploration is given almost entire in the "Herald," and constitutes one of the most interesting and profitable narratives of perseverance and heroism that have been given to the public in the annals of missions.

The entire receipts of the Roman Catholic Association for the propagation of the faith from all parts of the world were only $1,204,185 in 1880. Of this amount Europe contributed $1,178,22-, America gave less than $22,000, but received $130,435. Of the whole amount $181,789 was expended in Europe, $527,875 in Asia, $242,615 in Africa, $96,875 in Oceanica. The expenses of the society for publications and management were $59,305. Among the missions to receive grants are the Albert Nyanza, the Soudan, the Congo, the Benin, and the Victoria Nyanza missions in Africa. The two Lake missions receive about $40,000 each.

—Jerry McAuley's new mission, known as the Cremorne mission, on thirty-second street, New York City, was formally opened on Monday. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dodge, W. E. Dodge, Jr., and daughter, Morris K. Jesup, the Rev. Dr. Francis Prince and Rev. Dr. William M. Taylor. Funds enough were collected to pay the balance, $3,-400, on the building and to support the mission for a year. Cremorne Garden, whose place the mission takes, has been for years one of the worst dens of infamy in this city.

The London Missionary society finds the climate of Central Africa so baleful, and the expense so great, that they have talked of abandoning the station at Fiji on Lake Tanganyika. Since the beginning of the mission five years ago, four men have died, three have left on account of ill health, and the society has expended a sum of $40,000. The society will not at present abandon the mission, but will endeavor to obtain more healthy places of residence for the missionaries.

—A Conference of the Protestant missionaries of Japan is to be held in Osaka, from April 16 to 21, 1883. There are now in Japan 78 married male missionaries, 10 unmarried male missionaries, 48 unmarried female missionaries, 35 stations, 84 out-stations, 8 organized churches, 3,498 adult converts, 37 ordained native pastors, 116 unordained native preachers. Last year 18,000,000 pages of the New Testament and portions were sold for $16,000.

—The Leipsic Missionary Society, whose work is among the Tamils of India, reports the total number of converts thus far about 12,000. Last year, 544 were added to the church. The society employs nineteen ordained missionaries and fifty-eight catechists for 360 towns and villages. In addition to these, there are 173 teachers in 128 schools, with 2,438 scholars.

—A set of Hindoo dissenters recently broke into the temple of Juggernaut in India and tempted to burn the idol. The attack was prompted by the belief that if Juggernaut were burnt it would convince the Hindoos of the futility of their religion, and the whole world would then embrace their notions.

—The Mendi (Africa) Mission has been reinforced by the addition of Mr. J. A. St. John, a business man of Walton, N. Y.,—who goes to take charge of the business of the mission, the running of the saw-mills and the coffee farm, the repair of the buildings, the payment of the missionaries and the securing of supplies.

—The third annual report of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, shows them to have 21,338 members. They have young people's and children's organizations.

—The Christians of all evangelical denominations in the United States have given on an average, it is said, 24 cents each for foreign missions during the last ten years. The average for home missions is 28 cents.

—Mr. Murray Mitchell gives the whole number of Protestant Christians in Japan at 7,000, including children and inquirers.

—The lands, buildings, chapels, printing presses, etc., held by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign missions, is $777,800.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The trustees of the Chautauqua Assembly at their eighth annual session recently held, received the report of Dr. Vincent detailing a scheme for the next assembly so far as arranged. Meetings will begin July 8, 1882, with school of languages and the teachers' retreat, lasting three weeks. Public meetings will be opened July 20, and the assembly proper begins August 1, continuing to the 31. Instruction will be given in German by Prof. J. H. Worman, A. M., of New York; in French by Prof. A. Lalande, of Kentucky; in classical and historical Greek, and also in classical and ecclesiastical Latin, by Prof. Henry Laurens, of Massachusetts; in Hebrew by Rev. James Strong, of Madison, N. J.; in Anglo-Saxon and English literature, by W. H. McClintock, of Kentucky.

—The English Baptist Missionary Society reports, in its statistics for 1881, 38,337 members in its various fields, including 26,712 in the Jamaica Union. The baptisms for the year were 3,373, of which 2,394 were in Jamaica. The baptisms last year numbered 2,781. The net gain in communicants is 4,592. The net gain of the Jamaica Union is 3,945, from which it would appear that the work in the mission field proper has not been very prosperous. The pastors of self-supporting churches have increased from 57 to 61.

—A religious census of Edinburgh on a recent Sunday shows that the total church attendance at two services, out of a population of 228,000, was 101,-713. The Free churches had 28,558; the Established, 27,696; and the U. P., 20,-731. In the case of the two former the attendance was smaller than the membership, the Free Church having 21,182 communicants and the Established 26,-739.

The "Clerical World," the "Christian Commonwealth," "Christian Opinion," and the "Christian Leader," are four papers which have been started recently. The first named is edited by Canon Spence and the Rev. J. S. Exell, the editors of the "Pulpit Commentary." Mr. Exell is eminently a successful literary writer and scholar. According to the "Church Review," the "Commonwealth" is a counter-irritant to the "Christian World."

—The Duke of Norfolk is a stanch and devoted son of the Vatican. He is one of the richest men of the English aristocracy. He has just petitioned the Pope to allow him to divide the large diocese of Southwark and to allow him to erect a new see at Arundel. In all probability Leo will grant the request of his moneyed servant, and his grace will con amore erect a cathedral for the new diocese. He is now erecting one at Norwich.

—The London "Rock" says: "Curates are just now in demand, and men of any experience or ability are at a premium. We have had opportunity to see lately some replies to an advertisement for a Curate for a well-ordered parish in a healthy and accessible northern suburb, and we were not a little surprised at the conditions raised by some of the gentlemen who offered their services. The matter which seemed chiefly to concern all was 'society.' What society is there in the neighborhood?"

—The Free Religious Association is about to establish a fellowship, with a stipend of $500, to promote the education of a college-bred young man in preparation to become a teacher of religion on the basis of its principles. The appropriation has so far been made for one year, but will be continued if it proves successful.

Sunday, January 8, was "Charity day" at Prof. Swing's Church, Chicago. The offering, which is collected only once a year, amounted to a little over $5,000. It will be divided among the various local charities of the church, including its three Sunday-schools, which contain about 1,200 pupils.

The English Church Union (Ritualist) continues to gain in strength, as does it opponent, the Church Association. It has 270 branches and received last year 2,450 new members and associates, making the total 19,330. The Association had expected to advance the enrollment to 20,000 in the past year.

The collection of autograph letters formed by the late Dr. Morley Punshon, extending to seven volumes, and including letters from several royal personages as well as people eminent in art, science, literature, and ecclesiastical position, is to be sold at auction then.

—The Baptists of Sweden, who number about 21,000, recently held their triennial Conference in Stockholm. There are 300 churches.

LITTLE FOXES.

Among my tender vines I spy
A little fox, named—By-and-By.

Then set upon him quick, I say,
The swift young hunter—Right-away.

Around each tender vine I plant,
I find the little fox I can't.

Then, fast as ever hunter ran,
Chase him with bold and brave—I can.

No use in trying—huge and whites
This fox, among my tender vines.

Then drive him low and drive him high
With this good hunter, named—I'll try!

Among the vines in my small plot
Creeps in the young fox—I forgot.

Then hunt him out and to his den
With—I will not forget again!

A little fox is hidden there
Among my vines, named—I don't care!

Then let I'm sorry hunter true
Chase him afar from vines and you.

—Children's Hour.

That Money for Mexico.

DEAR LITTLE FOLKS: It is now four or five months since Annie and Olive Secrest told us in the ADVOCATE about their "Big Idea" of raising money enough to build a church or school in Mexico, and asked all their "little cousins in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana," to help them carry it out, and yet none of us have replied to them. I say "us," for I claim, and no one who knows me would deny me, the right to be called one of the little folks, though I may no longer be classed among the young folks. I have expected week after week to see a letter from some of the little readers of the ADVOCATE, letting us know they approved of their—Annie and Olive's—idea, and would join them in trying to raise the money needed for it. I know there are a great many of you who are willing to make and save all you can, but perhaps are going to do as Mrs. Secrest suggested—first make the money, and then send it, with your name to the editor. But I think it would be a good idea for all who intend giving anything to write now, and let us know what you are going to do. Don't you see that it will lead a great many others to join us that had not thought of it before? Dr. Parker will publish your letters, I know. He knows how much the children in his own city have done for foreign missions, and only a few weeks ago, Mr. Patterson, one of our preachers in Mexico, called his attention to Annie's and Olive's letter, and urged him to encourage us in trying to aid them. Then let all write who want to join us. All of us can do something; working together we can do a great deal. Now is the time, at the beginning of the year, to decide on what we will do. If we expect to accomplish anything. Annie and Olive tell us they are going to make their money by raising and selling chickens. A very good way for those who can raise them; but I never could. So I will have to try something else. My sister and I are going to have a potato and goober patch this year, and we have concluded that we will give a part of the proceeds of it. We hope, and think we will be able to give $5. My little nephew says that he too is going to make something "somehow." Now then, let us hear from the rest of you.

EMMA.

YAZOO COUNTY, Miss., Feb. 21, 1882.

Note by the Editor.—We heartily commend the idea of our correspondent and of Annie and Olive Secrest. Just now there is a school-house needed for Miss Charlotte Halleran's school in the City of Mexico. The ladies of some of our churches in New Orleans have determined to raise funds to build it. Our young friends who are minded so to do might give their contributions this direction, or Dr. Patterson may suggest the building of a church at some point, or in the absence of any specific enterprise the money can be raised for the Mexican mission, and the appropriation of it left to Mr. Patterson. Money remitted by the children to the editor of the ADVOCATE, for the Mexican or any other mission, will be duly acknowledged and disposed of as they may direct.

A Boy's Victory.

A dozen boys stood on the green by the school-house, careless and jolly, just from a game of ball. A boy came around the corner of the school-house with an old cloth cap on his head, and wearing a loosely-fitting garment of some coarse cloth. In his hands were an iron stove-shovel and a hod of ashes.

"Oh, here comes old Dust and Ashes," shouted one of the group, springing forward and giving the coat a jerk.

"Hullo! what's the price of sack-cloth?"

The boy's cheek flushed in an instant. The shovel rang on the gravel walk, and his fingers clutched; but as quickly his cheek paled again, and, clenching his teeth, as with a great effort to keep back something, he turned a little and muttered the word "mother!"

"Ho! ho!" shouted the other. "The baby's sick and wants to see his mother."

The boy in the coarse frock turned away and rapidly disappeared behind the old barn; then, breaking into a run, he fled swiftly down the path to the maple woods, his faithful Hunter bounding and racing by his side.

Most graciously stood the maples, all russet and crimson and yellow, bathed in the yellow haze of the still October afternoon.

In among their shadows he sprang, his feet rustling the dreary fallen leaves, and, flinging himself in a little hollow, he buried his face in his hands.

Poor Hunter stood by wondering why his young master, any more than himself, could possibly think of anything but birds and squirrels at such a time. Then the boy, seizing his only playmate in his arms, cried:

"Oh, nobody loves me; nobody loves me in the world but you, Hunter! Uh, mother, why did you die?"

And the sobs came fast and thick, and tears flowed like rain. Long did the motherless boy wail and cry, till from very weariness he could weep no longer. Tears brought relief, and the holy quiet of the grand old woods filled him with solemn and holy thoughts—thoughts of his dead mother.

Only one year ago she had died, and he remembered his agony and loneliness, and the year of toil as the ward of a cruel uncle. He remembered his eagerness to go to school, his trying to pay his way by working about the school-room, and the unfeeling gibes and jeers his humble station and coarse clothing had earned him.

Again the angry, rebellious thoughts came up, as his eyes fell on his coarse coat, and the quivering sobs returned; but with them came the words of that mother; and how her poor fingers had toiled to make that coat, the best she could give him. Though coarse its texture, every thread was hallowed by a mother's love. He took from his vest pocket the well-worn Bible her Bible—and read the precious promise to the widow and orphan again and again.

Now and strange thoughts came to him, and there, in the grand old forest, with the autumn sunset shimmering the golden maple leaves, was a new purpose born in his soul.

He had begun to conquer himself. Henceforth there was no hesitation for him. Body and soul, he devoted himself to God. Companions might jeer, but Jesus reigned in his heart.

Years rolled on, and the boy became a man, but the purpose formed in the old maple grove burned in his bosom yet; and now his foot from the deck of an Indian steamer, "hearing him swiftly to the chosen scenes of his toil, for these words are in his heart:

"I must be about my Master's business."—Sunday-School Messenger.

THE FOX'S DEFERENCE.—From time immemorial, the fox has been sly. The following story, however, seems to show that with his craft is occasionally mixed something which his betters might call worldly wisdom. A young cub was caught in the neighborhood of Bridgewater, England, and on account of his tender years probably was placed in the kitchen of the White Hart, where he grew up, winning and retaining the affection of his master and mistress. It can scarcely be said that he ate the bread of idleness; on the contrary, he did suit and service for his bread and board, his occupation being turnspit. Whether he grew weary of his employment, or was seized with a not unnatural desire to see something of the outer world, seems uncertain. One morning, a short time ago, he left his box by the fireside, crept out of the door, jumped lightly over the garden wall, and fairly took to his heels across the country. Viewed by a pack of hounds trotting leisurely along the road to the cover side, poor Reynard had to fly for his life. After a smart run of something like twenty miles, he perhaps became conscious that his sedentary life ill fitted him for such desperate exertion. Did his master or his mistress, and his crib in the corner, we wonder, come into his mind as likely to afford him security in his extremity? Be this as it may, he took lodge, ditch and bank as straight as a line, dashed into the kitchen, jumped into his box, and went on with his professional occupation with extraordinary energy.—Growing World.

GOOD TASTE AMONG THE MIGHTY.—The more I think about the elephants, the more wonderful they seem to be. The great, clumsy creatures are so very knowing, so very loving, and so like human beings in many of their qualities. They know their power well, and they also know just when they must not use it. Herein Great tells me that keepers and trainers of elephants often lie down on the ground and let the huge fellows step right over them; and that they feel perfectly safe in doing so, because they know the elephants will pick their way carefully over the prostrate forms, never so much as touching them, still less treading on them. Yet the mighty creatures can brush a man out of existence as easily as a man can brush away a fly. And what delicate tastes they have delighted, I'm told, with strawberries, gum-drops, or any little dainty of that kind! They are fond of bright colors, too, and travelers tell wonderful tales of seeing elephants gather flowers with the greatest care, and smell them, apparently with the keenest pleasure.

It is true they eat the same flowers afterward, but dear me! I've seen girls do the same thing! Many a time I've watched a little lady pluck a wild rose, look at it a moment, sigh "How lovely?" then open her pretty lips and swallow the petals one by one. Why shouldn't an elephant?—St. Nicholas.

NATURAL ENEMIES OF THE TELEGRAPH.—There is apparently no apparatus so liable to be interfered with, by what we may call natural causes as the electric telegraph. Fish gnaw, and molluscs overweight the submarine conductors of the subterranean wires; while there is at least one instance of a frolicsome whale entangling himself in a deep sea cable, to its utter disorganization. It is stated that within the three years ending 1878 there have been sixty serious interruptions to telegraphic communication in Sumatra by elephants. In one instance, these sagacious animals, most likely fearing snares, destroyed a considerable portion of the line, hiding away the wires and insulators in a remembrance. Monkeys of all tribes and sizes, too, in that favored island, used the poles and wires as gymnasia, occasionally breaking them and carrying off the insulators; while the numerous tigers, bears, and buffaloes, on the track, render the watching and repair of the line a duty of great danger. In Australia, where there are no wild animals to injure the wires, which are carried great distances overland, they are said to be frequently cut down by the scarcely less wild aborigines, who manufacture from them rings, armlets, and other varieties of barbaric ornament.

My grandma met a fair gallant one day,
And blushing, gave the gentleman a daisy;
Now, if your grandma acted [illegible] way,
Would you not think the deed old and fusty?
O, fie, fie, grandmamma!

And then the gentleman he bold smiling down,
And told my grandma that he loved her dearly;
And grandma, smiling back, forgot to frown.
Ah, grandpa met! So he dearly (nearly)
O, fie, Grandpa!

Remaining Afflictions.

Paul seems to speak of his sufferings in the service of Christ, and for the church, as definitely measured out, and to be fully endured. He speaks of filling "up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church." His suffering was to be fulfilled, as well as his active work. He took this into the account of his great mission. Standing at some point in his Christian career, how near the end we do not know, he contemplates the filling up "of that which is behind." He did not expect to be exempt from affliction. In the past he had suffered much, but not yet enough. He had a work to do; he had also suffering to endure. Of both he must fill up that which is behind, of the one as well as of the other. In regard to our Christian work, we may feel that we are in arrears. It is not common, however, to regard affliction in this light, and that there are deficits in suffering to be made good.

All suffering, endured in Christian faith and submission, may be accounted as the afflictions of Christ. In this aspect of sanctified suffering in general, it may be true of all Christ's followers that they are in arrears on this score, and that, in their present afflictions, they are filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ. To be behind on other accounts, as that of labors, of certain duties, of giving, is easily felt and admitted. But it is difficult to look upon suffering in this way. And yet this is the state and attitude of every child of God who is passing through the fire. Affliction is needful for discipline, and thus inures to the spiritual and eternal benefit of the sufferer. It is also needed as a witness to the world, and as a demonstration of the grace of God, and the power of the gospel to support in tribulation.

It is thus that every afflicted believer is suffering for a high and blessed purpose and end. How much in any individual case we can not say, but, in whatever measure, that measure of suffering for Christ is to be filled up. That which is behind of these afflictions we can not definitely and certainly estimate, but still it enters into our thoughts and calculations under present pain, and in our forecasts of the future.

In a more direct sense, there are afflictions of Christ. Such, for example, as grow out of our religious profession, and are connected with the faithful performance of duty. Once persecution was inseparable from the open confession of Christ. There is self-denial now, and personal sacrifices, and painful duties, connected with the Christian life. It is not possible that a faithful discipleship, even in the present day, can be altogether without afflictions endured for Christ, and "for his body's sake, which is the church." Certainly no minister of Christ, who is true to his vows and to his great commission, can be without affliction. Not to have suffered almost discredits the claims of those who have assumed to be embassadors for Christ.

This phase of suffering is too much overlooked in our estimate of Christian duty and experience. The thought may be entertained that no suffering is required in these days, or that possibly we have suffered enough, and that we are entitled to exemption from hardness for the future. The truth of the matter is, that while the Christian lives in this world he is ever in arrears on this account, and that he must fill up that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ. He is not yet done with affliction. His sufferings may not yet have culminated. In filling up that which is behind, he may be called to heavier sacrifices, and to sharper pain, and to deeper sorrows than have fallen upon the past.

Ordinarily present suffering is most depressing. The anticipation of suffering fills the soul with gloom. But, where suffering can be described as "the afflictions of Christ," there is joy in it. Paul rejoiced in his sufferings, and he met this filling up of that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ with a serene spirit.

Nor in this conception of suffering is there a shadow of creature-merit or self-righteousness. There is a disposition to build upon both works and suffering, upon suffering, perhaps, even more than upon works. But this perversion of suffering deprives it of all advantage and of all blessedness. It is a gracious discipline in the path of Christian duty, but all is lost when we build upon suffering—our own suffering—as the ground of salvation. No inspired writer has said so much of the disciplinary benefits of affliction as Paul, and none has more fully and strongly insisted that the death of Christ is the sole ground of our justification. To fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ is not to meet an unpaid balance of creature merit, but rather through grace to suffer all the perfect will of God.

The state of mind which this view of suffering describes is that of Christian watchfulness and complete submission. The outlook is a joyous one, although the horizon is filled with clouds. In the earthly future the path is thickly strewd with crosses, and afflictions are almost certain to meet us at every turn. As the faithful performance of duty may require, and as the discipline of the soul may demand, there will be suffering. What and how much is matter of small moment, if we are in love and faith so united to Christ that we suffer with him, and know the fellowship of his sufferings. What would be to unbelief a gloomy outlook is to faith a perspective of matchless beauty, a scene lighted up and aglow with the supernatural and the unseen.

Recreation in Religion.

The church is no more bound to furnish diversions for its people than it is to furnish them with employment. Religious principles apply to both, and the practical precepts of the Bible, and rules of church order and discipline, indicate the line of Christian duty concerning them. If it be true that Christians must have amusements, and that the young people especially must have them, it does not follow that the church is to furnish them. Religion is the business of the church. Its mission is to preach the gospel, administer the ordinances, to supply the means of grace, to do what it can for benevolent and religious objects, and to endeavor to bring the people to Christ.

Social reunions, however, under the guidance of pastors and church members, and conducted in accordance with the spirit of the gospel, may be productive of much good. Conversation, music and literary entertainment might fill up the evening, and there would be a decided benefit socially to all concerned. In this direction our churches could do much more than they are doing to supply harmless and even beneficial diversions to the young people.

There is, apart from any expedients of this kind, an element of recreation in religion itself. As a relief from the weariness and cares of business and domestic affairs, there is nothing comparable to the duties of religion. The fatigued business man, the worried housewife, find refreshment in the weekly prayer meeting. Nothing is more restful to the tired body and the exhausted nerves than an hour spent in social worship.

The craving for social intercourse is abundantly met and satisfied in the company of worshipers. The communion of saints is society in its religious aspects, and it is designed to be to the Christian what worldly society is to the worldly. Because of the higher purposes and benefits of religious association and worship, we are apt to underrate their value as a means of recreation. Thousands of people have scarcely any other society than that connected with their duties and relations to the church, and the public and social services of the house of God are the only relief they have from the monotonous routine of secular affairs and daily toil. They find their recreation in their religion. Its duties are pleasant, and their spare time is occupied with them. The bow of care and labor is unbent, the strain upon mind and body is relaxed, and the isolation of home-life is expanded into a circle of the most congenial and helpful character.

Sunday, with many religious people, is a busy day. What with the Sunday-school and the public services and other meetings, the time is all occupied. And yet it is a change from the work of the week, and the effect is even more invigorating and refreshing than if the day had been spent in idleness and lounging at home. The Sabbath is indeed a day of true recreation to those who spend it in religious occupations. To those that labor, and to those that spend the day in pleasure-seeking, it is destructive of vitality.

The spiritually-minded Christian will find that his leisure is fully taken up with his religious duties, and the recreation there is in them will satisfy him. And this is about equal to saying, that people who are zealously religious will have no desire to seek for mere diversions outside the path of religious duty. If the taste be formed for religious associations, and there be delight in religious services and exercises, and the mind and heart be filled and occupied with the truth and joy of divine wisdom, there will be no desire and no clamor for worldly amusements.

The recreation of spiritual men and women is in their religion, and not outside of it. Her ways are ways of pleasantness. There is cheerfulness, joy unspeakable, and the most delightful and satisfying entertainment in them. The services of religion are not a gloomy dirge, nor a perpetual penance. They are not a yoke of bondage, a cruel task, nor a repulsive burden. Neither is religion in opposition to the healthy yearnings of our nature for that which shall entertain and invigorate. It is in itself the sum of all that is wholesome to the mind and body. It is the tree of life planted in the world to restore the wasting energies, and to supply all the needs of the soul. It is every way and powerfully recreative. There is recreation in religion.

"Unscientific."

There are some persons who take exceptions to the Christian religion on the ground that some of the methods by which its truth is sought to be established, and that some of the tests by which its truth is sought to be verified, are unscientific. This is especially the case with the argument which is dearest and most precious to the Christian heart. It is alleged that the argument from consciousness has no value outside of those who feel it. In scientific phrase it is said to have no "objective value." It may be of service in a "subjective" way, but subjective arguments are only of value to those making them. Science lays very great stress upon facts, and its theories are all constructed so as to explain the facts, and that theory is said to be true which best explains them. Now, when a man says, "I know that religion is true, because I realize its power and peace in my soul," this is said to be unscientific, because there is no objective fact presented. Here is the error. Facts are of two kinds: facts of observation and facts of consciousness. To establish a fact of either kind there must be recourse to some sort of testimony. The establishment of a fact and the explanation of a fact are two very different things. Here is where a mistake is made. It is in confounding things that are different. The establishment of a fact of consciousness depends upon the same kind of testimony as the establishment of a fact of observation. And not only this, but the way to the verification of the facts is open. This is admitted by all in regard to facts of observation. A man tells me this: "I saw a chemist mix one part of hydrogen with eight parts of oxygen, and the result was water." Here is a fact presented to me by human testimony. I can believe it, because I know the man to be a truthful man. But science says my action in that case would be unscientific, because I have no experience that two invisible gases, uniting in certain proportions, will produce such a visible thing as water, and human testimony is not competent to overthrow experience. On scientific grounds, before I can really believe the statement made, I must visit the chemist's labaratory, and verify that statement by my senses. When I do this I occupy impregnable ground, and can believe that water is composed of one part of hydrogen and eight parts of oxygen. Now, if this verification has not resolved itself into a fact of consciousness it is difficult to see what it is. Now, right at this point is where scientific unbelief dodges. A man professes that the love of God is in his heart. The science man says that is not in accordance with my experience, and your testimony is not valid as against that experience. The man of God says: "The way is open for you to verify the truth of my statement; taste and see that the Lord is good." The man of science contradicts his own teaching, about the verification of facts, by turning away in a most unscientific manner. If, according to science, a man can not consistently deny the statement that water is composed of hydrogen and oxygen, as long as he refuses to apply the tests which will verify the statement, what shall be thought of the science of that man who refuses to apply the tests to verify the facts of consciousness? The tests are to verify the facts, not to explain them. No man can consistently deny any fact so long as he refuses to apply the tests which claim to prove its existence. At this point a good deal of science becomes quite unscientific. Here is another point. Religion, being an experience in the soul, results in a change of the character. It is a fact, plain to everybody, that wicked men do sometimes become righteous. Their characters have been wonderfully changed, and the fact is patent to the most casual observer. The fact is verified by the open deeds of the life. It is then an established fact. How can it be explained? Now, according to science, the theory that best explains the fact is the true theory. Every change is a result of the action of something behind. Here is a change in this man's deeds which points to a change in his character, and now the question is, what has changed his character? The theory of religion—God in the soul, operating directly upon it—is the only theory that can consistently explain this fact. Religion proposes to do this very thing. It asserts openly that this is its mission. It is the only thing that ever did propose to do this. Then, when we see religion doing what it proposes to do, and in its very operations upon the soul producing the thing which it alone can explain, it does not seem to be very unscientific to accept that explanation. Here is another fact. Christian character is built up and developed by the experiences of this religion in the heart. Christian character is the resultant of the human consciousness and the Divine Spirit operating together in harmony. In the long line of history this fact has never changed, nor has the theory that explains it changed. The Christian character to-day is the same that it was ages ago, and the explanation is the same. The fact is established in the same way, and the way to the verification of the fact is open just as it was the day Philip said to Nathanael: "Come and see." There is never an exception found in this long line. The facts and theories always correspond. Religion placed itself upon the true scientific basis when it said: "Oh! taste, and see that the Lord is good." Christ shut the mouth of all scientific unbelief when he said to Thomas: "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing."

Trip to Georgia.

Summoned by telegram to visit my aged and afflicted father, I left Canton at half-past nine on the night of the fourteenth of February, and, passing by Jackson, where I would have been compelled to wait twenty-two hours for the regular train to Meridian, reached New Orleans at about seven the next morning. Spending ten hours from necessity in the city, I took the first train at five in the afternoon for Mobile and Montgomery, and, notwithstanding the loss of time in the city, reached my destination at Turin, Ga., fully twelve hours sooner than I could have done by the shorter route by way of Meridian and Selma. To my great gratification I found my father surviving and improving somewhat.

The regular and pleasant motion of the cars on the railway which extends through, I believe, an unbroken plain along the coast from New Orleans to Mobile, reminded me alike of the smooth flow of the vowels and the idea of motion contained in the name of the city we were approaching, while a slight jolt now and then, as we progressed on the same train toward the next great city, suggested occasionally the mountainous associations of the name of Montgomery. Morning opened upon us as we approached the latter place. The Alabama river was full, and out of its banks in places. At Montgomery we changed cars for Atlanta. On the Western railroad of Alabama I noticed a great improvement upon the usual method of announcing stations. Instead of the inarticulate bawl by the brakesman, one sees hanging conspicuously in the front end of the car a card printed in large letters, that may be easily read, night or day, with the name of the station at which the train will next stop. For instance, "Next station is Notasuga." A passenger is thus informed of his whereabouts at all times.

Signs of life and activity were not wanting on the plantations along the route. Not much new land has been cleared, but a good deal of the old had been broken up, as early as the middle of February, notwithstanding the excessive rainfall of the preceding thirty or forty days. Old fences have been upset and reset, houses have been recovered, ditches have been cut or reopened, and all the preparations for the coming crop are being vigorously prosecuted. The people in this section, and, so far as I can learn, throughout the State of Georgia, have planted an unusually large acreage in small grain. Fields covered with growing wheat or oats greet the eye on every hand, reminding one of the couplet,

> Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
> Stand dressed in living green.

To see cows grazing in wheat or oats eight or ten inches high, amid the frosts of February, is a pleasant sight, suggestive of comforting thoughts. It is a redeeming feature and a hopeful sign amid the red old hills and hard times of Georgia.

The financial pressure is here about as elsewhere. The credit system is working its legitimate results of injury or ruin to merchants and people who buy. Men who borrow money think ten or twelve per cent. a high rate of interest. But planters who buy on credit pay from forty to one hundred per cent. on the real cash value of what they buy. Can they do it? No more than a man can afford to pay forty or a hundred per cent. for money. If there were no credit there could be no bankruptcy and no debts. While the credit system is continued, extortion, bankruptcy and financial distresses of many kinds will be of more or less frequent and general occurrence. It is the best policy to obey the Scriptural exhortation: "Owe no man anything." It is hard for the average man to see his errors, and harder still to abandon them. As I glanced through a car window my eye fell upon an elderly man sitting upon the steps of his piazza, with a little boy beside him. At the same time I noticed that the palings had fallen in several places from the enclosure of his yard. I wondered why he did not nail them in their places again. Then I thought he has become accustomed to seeing them off. So we get used to our errors and our faults. We need others to tell us of them, and then we do not see them as others do.

Spring is opening beautifully, notwithstanding the late sharp spell of cold. The yellow jessamine hangs its golden festoons upon the leafless boughs in places, and the perfume of the opening flowers of the plum and the peach give sweet promise of coming fruits, which may not our ingratitude and sin compel our heavenly Father to cut off.

It is sad to think we shall see our beloved Bishop Wightman no more on earth. Most worthily did he fill a place among the noblest and best. He seemed to be as conscientious in his conduct as he was accurate in his scholarship. A gentleman, a scholar, and a Christian of the highest order, we do not often look upon his equals. From a life of faithfulness we trust he has gone to the fruition beyond the boundaries of time.

For a week I have been trying to comfort and strengthen my afflicted father. When I was a little child I followed him, and desired to go with him wherever he went. Now he follows me, and is pained if I leave him at all. Such are our lives; one hangs upon another. The weak grows strong, the strong grows weak, and there is no permanent satisfaction but in the hopes of a blessed immortality, where age and feebleness and parting are not known.

Within a few days I must leave him in the hands of other loved ones, and return to my work in Mississippi, hoping, if the will of God be so, that I shall yet see his face again in the flesh.

The Law of the Superannuate.

MR. EDITOR: We believe it is generally conceded there might be some change made in the law of the church, which pertains to superannuated and worn-out preachers, which would be more satisfactory and more in keeping with the principles of justice and equity.

Under the present law a preacher, early in life and early in his ministry, his health prematurely failing, may be granted a superannuated relation, and he will be entitled to all the immunities of that relation.

Another has grown old in the service of the church, is literally worn out in the itinerancy, and he is granted a superannuated relation. One, it may be, has traveled sixty years, while the other has only traveled eight years; yet both are entitled, under the law, to the same support. It is true the Joint Board of Finance has the right to discriminate, but the discrimination has reference more to necessity than to equity. They can favor the more needy. Still there is a vast difference between need and equity. I may need all my claim as a travelling preacher, while the preacher on the next circuit, being well-to-do in the world, may not need his claim at all. He is able to live without it. Has that circuit a right to his services for nothing, because forsooth he does not need his claim. The one who traveled eight years may be as needy as the one who has traveled sixty years; yet equity would demand that a difference be made.

We are aware that it is much easier to find fault with an existing law than even to suggest an improvement. But when it is so apparent that the present plan is not an equitable one, it may be well enough to suggest some other plan, that out of a multiplicity of suggestions the law-making body may gather something out of which to make an improvement. We think changes in church polity should be made with great caution, and after mature deliberation. Injury will be sure to result when a change is made without improvement. We would, however, suggest that thirty years of itinerant service be made the basis of a full salary for a superannuated preacher, and then let the old quarterage claim, $300 for a preacher and his wife, with the respective claims for the children, or some other amount, be fixed as the basis of the claim, for there must be a basis for calculation. Then the calculation is easy, as thirty is to eight so let the claim be. It may be said there will be the same inequality between the one who has traveled sixty years and the one who has traveled only thirty years. In this case, however, the one who has traveled thirty years has earned all he gets, and admit the one who has traveled sixty years has earned more than he gets, yet they both get a living, and both have earned it. The one who has earned more than he gets may be comforted upon the ground that it is more blessed to give than to receive. And still the Joint Board of Finance might return their right to discriminate, in favor of the more deserving, if at any time there should be a surplus of funds. We would further suggest that eight years of itinerant service be required in order to render any one eligible to a superannuated relation. Bishop Soule once said eight years was an itinerant crisis. This term of years usually will inure one to itinerant life so that he will continue, or else it will reveal to him, that he is unequal to the task, and he will retire.

MANSFIELD, LA., Feb. 16, 1882.

Departed this Life.

HER SUN HAS GONE DOWN AT NOON.

MR. EDITOR: We have had a sad and mournful week in Vicksburg. We have laid in the grave our beloved sister, Mrs. Laura G. Carradine, the late wife of our pastor, Rev. B. Carradine. Her disease was prostration of the nervous system, terminating in cerebretis. For several days she was unconscious, and passed away as

> "Dies a wave along the shore."

But before she fell into that last sleep she remarked to one very near to her: "I may die in a state of unconsciousness, but I die in Jesus." And so her gentle spirit seemed to catch a glimpse of the manner of her departure from among us.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Of her it may be said she was blessed while living, for she had no thought or aim but to live unto and then die in the Lord.

Her whole life was a bright commentary upon the doctrines and teachings of the gospel. She might, with great propriety, have said, as another had done before her day: "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." That gain has dawned upon the soul, but its greatness, extent and desirableness can only be ascertained by the immeasureableness of eternity. Her life was one of complete consecration to the church, and she illustrated the vast degree in which a pastor's wife may sustain, encourage and assist him in his great and solemn work. But for the necessity of brevity we might unfold a picture—a full length portrait—that could but be loved, and at the same time stand as a bright and beautiful example to the young wives of many of the ministers of the church. We may simply say as a church we are all deeply afflicted, and sorrow sincerely with our bereaved pastor and his gentle sweet children. I will add the following notices from our morning city papers. The Herald said:

The funeral of the late Mrs. Laura G. Carradine took place from the Methodist Church yesterday morning at the hour previously announced. Impressive funeral services were held over the remains by the Rev. Dr. Marshall, assisted by Drs. Price and Hamberlin. Dr. Price offered a most touching prayer, Mr. Hamberlin read in a most impressive manner the service for the dead, while Dr. Marshall delivered an eulogy on the deceased which was not only truly eloquent, but exquisite in taste and beautiful in sentiment and diction. The choir of the Methodist Church sang several hymns that were appropriate to the occasion, and the Church itself was handsomely draped green and white emblematic of purity and immortality. The Church was crowded to overflowing with a host of friends and sympathisers. Of course it is needless to say that the heartfelt condolence of this community goes out in its entirety and fullness to the bereaved husband and the motherless children in this the hour of their bitterest affliction. May He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb and feeds the ravens when they cry, and suffers no creature of his, who in him, trusts, to lack, be their guide support and protector in all the dim uncertain future.

The Evening Commercial had the following:

ANOTHER NOBLE SPIRIT GONE

The announcement of the death of Mrs. Laura G. Carradine, the estimable, affectionate and devoted wife of Rev. B. Carradine, will cast a gloom over this whole community. At seven o'clock this morning her gentle spirit left behind all cares of earth and passed away to the realms of everlasting rest. Her illness was of short duration and was probably caused by over exertion, anxiety and the care exacted of her in the double duty of watching at the bedside of her husband, during his recent sickness, and also in ministering to the wants of her suffering little daughter, who had the misfortune to be severely burnt a few weeks ago. Mrs. Carradine was a gentle, devoted and affectionate wife and mother, and possessed in an eminent degree all those estimable qualities and virtues that grace and adorn truest womanhood, and ever made her a constant well-spring of pleasure to her husband and children. Although her residence in this city was of short duration, her disposition and character were such as to win for her the voluntary homage of respect, admiration and love of all whose good fortune it was to know her. Her life and death were alike beautiful. In life she demonstrated that there was real beauty in the performance of all the christian duties, and in death she found comfort in the blessed promises that are gathered at the foot of the cross.

These were the beautiful tributes of appreciative observers.

"Be ye also ready" sounds with peculiar emphasis in our ears; and when the final hour comes, may it find us as reconciled and as ready, and so depart in peace.

ONE THAT STOOD BY.

Rev. G. G. Smith, writing in the Wesleyan Christian Advocate, about the colored people says:

"The pure motives of those who are trying to arouse the church to a greater interest in the welfare of the colored people among us are not to be impugned. The fact charged that we have not done our whole duty to the negro is not to be denied; but the impression made that we have been criminally and intentionally derelict, and that we, as a church, have given the colored people up because they belonged to a certain political party, is denied in toto.

We have never done our whole duty by any man, or race of men, but we have come nearer to doing so to the negro than to any other race of men. We have done more with heathen negroes than the English have with heathen Hindoos, or our Northern friends with infidel Germans, or Catholic Irishmen. We did something before the war; we have done directly but little since. Why?

Are our leaders ignorant of the events which immediately followed our conquest? Do they remember when Edwin M. Stanton held us by the throat, while strangers were placed over our colored charges? Do our people forget, when the colored people in all our cities, save one or two, left us en masse! Do our people forget the persecutions of the faithful few who held on to our church? Do they forget the torch which burned the church in Macon, and the force which held the church in Savannah? Why did the Oxford Church leave us? Why were the churches we built turned into halls for loyal leagues to meet in? We may, and we do forgive all this. We are not even unmindful of the facts which to a large extent excuse it, but we can not hear our fathers condemned for not doing what they tried to do. We would gladly have held every colored member if we could have done so, and we never set off the colored church until we were forced to do so. Why do we not now send them missionaries? White missionaries they would not have. Negroes as intelligent as we could send serve them now. Why do we not educate their preachers? Because we can not educate our own people. If we hold the land, they have the muscle. Why do we let the North do the work? Because it is a debt due to the negroes, and payment long delayed. From 1620 to 1865 the whole cost of civilizing and Christianizing a race of heathens was borne by one section, while the other was being enriched by their labor. Not a man nor a dollar came from any other direction. With gratitude to God, we point to the results of our work; with shame we confess our own short comings. After this was it not a Providence which gave to the wealth, to the intelligence of this country, an excess which, if we had it, would have availed us little? But it is charged we opposed them at every step. Before High Heaven, I declare I did not. I declare that I do not, and I do not believe I am any better than others. The men who threw obstacles in our way and drove us from them may blame us now, but the blame rests elsewhere.

Dr. Abel Stevens, writing from Europe to the Central Christian Advocate, says:

All the talk about the restoration of the city of Rome, and the temporal power, of the Pope, is the sheerest nonsense. There is no serious hint of the kind, in Europe, except by the blind priestly party. The Italian press and the Italian king, have lately uttered brave allusions to the subject showing that they would not admit that question to be relevant to any nation but their own; and they themselves do not dream of it, any more than they do of locating their capital in the crater of Vesuvius. All Rome is being renovated, to a great extent rebuilt, by the location of the government there; the city would rise in insurrection at a serious official whisper about its restoration to the Pope, and all Italy would join in that insurrection. For it is an undeniable fact that in no Catholic country in the world are the Pope and the priesthood more unpopular than in Italy. The unity of the country, with Rome for its capital, is the one supreme political idea of the Italians. Neither from Germany nor from Italy, then, can such a folly as the restoration of the temporal power be suggested.

The thought that it is important to Italy to retain the Pope resident in her capital, must seem singular to foreign liberals. Why not let him go elsewhere, if he wishes to go? Why would it not be a desirable riddance to Italy were he to go to Malta, or to Austria, or still better to America? Italy, we think, is unnecessarily anxious about his frequently-threatened migration. The menace, however, is generally understood to be without serious intent. The Vatican, not the Quirinal, would suffer by the effluge. In a darker age the Pope could make some show of himself at Avignon, but his abdication of his Roman chair, would now be the abdication of his chief prestige; the foundation of his power would slip away. He could hardly commit a more impolitic act than to ostracise himself.

Rev. Egerton Ryerson, D. D., L. L. D., an eminent minister of the Methodist Church in Canada, and for thirty two years Superintendent of Education in the province of Ontario, died on Feb. 19. He was the son of Col. Joseph Ryerson, a British officer in the Revolutionary War. Dr. Ryerson was born in the township of Charlottsville Canada, 1803, received a good classical education and became a Methodist minister in 1825. He was one of six sons, five of whom become ministers of the Gospel. In 1826, the year after Canadian Methodism became an independent Church, the Christian Guardian was launched, and he was appointed its first Editor. Altogether he conducted the Guardian for nearly nine years. He was for many years a power in the political as well as in the religious history of Canada. He was a delegate to the British Conference in 1833, and in the General Conference in 1838. In 1844, he was appointed Chief Superintendent of Education for Upper Canada. To better fit himself for the work, he made a tour of inquiry in Europe which lasted for over a year, and for five years later was occupied in founding the system of education which has had such an important influence in the intellectual and material development of that Province. He was known as a powerful writer, principally on "Church and State" question; his protests against the "arrogant claims of churchmen" being especially noticeable.—Central Christian Advocate.

The total number of conversions, reported by us since January 1st, says the N. Y. Methodist, of Feb. 25, increased this week by 4,855. We have previously reported 18,401, making an aggregate to date 23,398. The churches, it will be seen in our news column, are often reported without figures for the conversions, so that we have many revivals whose results are yet to be put on the record, and we have heard as yet from only a part of all the Methodist churches. We should note that the condensed summary given on page 14 does not include the figures in notices on other news pages. The glorious revival work is going on with increasing power. The reports last week came from 136 churches; this week they are from 193. The total number of charges reported from, since January 1st, is 563.

Rev. W. R. Sims, writing from Brandon, Miss., March 3, says:

The year's work at Brandon begins auspiciously. I have just secured and am now occupying an admirable parsonage, which is more than half paid for, and balance in fair prospect. A liberal and godly woman headed the subscription list with one hundred dollars in cash.

Though dissuaded by a former failure, I have reorganized my class meeting and was rewarded at the first appointment a few days since by a glorious season therein. Many hearts were filled to overflowing, and the formal walls of our ten thousand dollar church rang with surprise at the sound of a genuine old Methodist shout. Our circuit judge, Bro. Mayers, whom you know, among others, rose to speak, but could only stand a moment; a silent yet mighty witness, and sink into his seat overpowered.

Class meeting, it seems, and parsonage are not incompatible.

You know how these things rejoice the young pastor.

MISS WILLARD.—Miss Frances E. Willard, the distinguished temperance advocate and lecturer, has spent several days in New Orleans during the past week. During her sojourn here she has been the guest of Judge and Mrs. E. T. Merrick, on Napoleon Avenue.

Miss Willard addressed a full house at the Carondelet Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South, on Sunday afternoon, March 5; and she was again greeted by a large audience at the Coliseum Place Baptist Church on Monday night. She addressed the ladies of New Orleans at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association on Tuesday morning, and a reception was given her at Judge Merrick's on Tuesday night. She announced at the Monday night service that she expected to leave for Chicago on Wednesday of this week. Miss Willard is a woman of rare gifts, and of the highest qualities both of head and heart. She speaks well, convincingly, persuasively, and in a womanly manner.

The hearer almost forgets the woman in the interests with which she invests her theme, and in the absence of all self-consciousness in her pleading for truth and righteousness. She is certainly the most sensible and attractive advocate of temperance that we have ever heard.

In general we believe that the platform, the rostrum, or the pulpit is not woman's sphere. In this case, however, we rather yield to the popular verdict, and bid Miss Willard a hearty God-speed in her most urgent and noble mission. Our people have been delighted with her presence, and she has doubtless given a fresh impulse to the cause, and greatly cheered and encouraged our temperance workers.

We can not indeed too highly commend the deep religious feeling, and the spirit and intelligence which characterize her addresses. Many advocates of temperance might, with advantage, take lessons from this most eloquent and accomplished woman.

—The floods now devastating large sections of the Mississippi valley are simply appalling, and they are still increasing. We believe there is yet no serious breaks in the levees below Natchez, but there is great danger opposite Baton Rouge, where a destructive crevasse is regarded as almost inevitable. Some portions of the Lafourche country are flooded, but thus far the sugar regions have not suffered greatly. The suffering in the overflowed sections is very great, and the loss of property will amount to millions. So far as we can gather from reports the present high water is more destructive than that of any season on record. In many places our church work must be temporarily suspended, and there will be great loss in church property, and serious embarrassment in the collections, and in the support of the preachers.

—We are informed that the Benevolent Society connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Natchez, Miss., has contributed $100 to the relief of Rev. Dr. Linfield, whose house at Hazelhurst was recently burned. Let others go and do likewise. Dr. Linfield is entirely helpless, a wreck in mind and body, and the destruction of his home is a great calamity. He received as a superannuate at the last session of the Mississippi Conference only $107.

In this connection we would urge the preachers and people to increased effort to bring up the collections for Conference claimants. The amount raised here-to-fore has been entirely inadequate. Let all the Conferences wake up in this matter.

—"I expect to be a subscriber to the ADVOCATE just as long as I can get the money to pay for it." This is the language of many in their communications to the publisher and editor. We have a good many devoted friends. May their tribe increase. Most people who appreciate a religious paper can raise two dollars a year to pay for it. Droughts, floods and other misfortunes will make curtailment and self denial necessary in many directions, but the ADVOCATE will be among the last things to be cut off. It is a necessity to the religious welfare, and to intelligence and usefulness in the church.

—We have received a copy of the Minutes of the late session of the Virginia Conference. These Minutes are more elaborate and voluminous than those of any other Conference. They are very complete and free from typographical errors. They are edited and published for the Conference by Rev. A. G. Brown. A valuable essay on the grace of giving by the editor, Bro. Brown, is published in connection with the Minutes.

—Last week the Queen of England was shot at, but no harm was done. In this case the would-be assassin is no doubt a crazy man—a man who has been confined, at one time, in a lunatic asylum. The civilized world will rejoice that the good Queen escaped unhurt. Crowned heads and Presidents, in such perils, pay for the honors and glory and fame which they possess. And yet there are very few who would not be willing to take the position along with its dangers.

—In another column will be found a notice of the death of Sister Carradine, wife of Rev. B. Carradine, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Vicksburg, Miss. A very deep sorrow has fallen upon Bro. Carradine, and upon the church also. May the Father of mercies comfort and sustain the stricken ones.

—Dr. H. F. Johnson, president of Whitworth Female College, spent two or three days in the city recently, preaching on Sunday night last at Carondelet Street Church. Dr. Johnson informed us that Whitworth was doing well.

—We see, from the Western Methodist, that Dr. Patterson was warmly greeted in Memphis, and that he did full work there on Sunday, February 26. He left for the Baltimore Conference last week.

—By notice on our eighth page it will be seen that the New Orleans District Conference will meet at Baton Rouge on Thursday, at four P. M., April 13.

—We are obliged to Dr. C. F. Evans for a copy of the Minutes of the last session of the Little Rock Conference.

Gambling in Futures.

It seems they have a level headed judge in Memphis, one who can see the gambling principle in dealing in futures, and has the courage to charge the Grand Jury accordingly. The Memphis Avalanch of the 25 ultimo, says:

The gambling in futures that has wrought so much havoc here lately has at last come before the public under a judicial stamp.

Judge Pierce on yesterday sent for the Grand Jury and charged them as follows concerning gambling in futures:

Gentlemen: You have been charged generally upon the law of gaming, but the court thinks it proper to charge you specially as to a species of gaming that has come to the attention of the court through the public prints and otherwise. And that is wagering as to the possible future prices of products, stocks or other property. If a person should make a contract to buy or sell any product or other property at a given price to be delivered at a future day, and actually intends to handle and deliver said product or commodity even if he had not the property in possession, provided he had a reasonable expectation of acquiring it in time for the future delivery, this would be a legitimate business transaction. But if a person make a contract similar to that in form expecting in the end to pay or settle the differences only, and has no intention or reasonable expectation of ever handling or delivering said product or property, this amounts merely to a wager as to what the future price will be. And the court charges you that this is playing at a game of hazard or chance within the meaning of the law, and is in violation of the law and should be presented by indictment. And any one who keeps open a place for the carrying on of such transactions is keeping a gambling house within the meaning of the law, and is liable to indictment therefor. This is a great evil in this community and one which demands your attention. You will, however, examine with care the cases presented and find indictments only where the same, in your judgment can be sustained by the proof in this court.

DAILY ADVOCATE.—Dr. McFerrin gives notice that he will publish at Nashville a sixteen page daily paper, during the session of the General Conference to meet there the first of May. It is to be first class as to paper, etc. He wants all who propose to subscribe to send in their names at once. The price will be $1, and $1.50 for a bound volume, after the Conference is over. Address,

J. B. M'FERRIN, Agent,
Nashville, Tenn.

Revival meetings are very general in all sections of the country. The extra services in the Methodist churches of Cincinnati and vicinity have resulted in about 750 conversions. At the altar of St. Paul's 363 persons were converted. The Methodist of this city says it has recorded in its issues for 1882 nearly 13,000 conversions in Methodist churches.—N. Y. Independent.

The Methodist Book Committee has decided to discontinue the book depository at Atlanta, Ga., and to increase slightly the salaries of the bishops and editors of the Church.

The Rev. W. H. Smith, father of the Rev. A. Coke Smith, of the South Carolina Conference, and of Mrs. J. W. Koger, one of our Missionaries to Brazil, died at his residence, near Lynchburg, S. C., on Friday last, Feb. 17th, in the sixty-third year of his age.

Krupp, the famous gunmaker, had in his employ a few weeks ago 23,000 men; but new orders have compelled him to hire an additional force of 8,000, which places him at the head of a fair-sized city, with a population of over 30,000.

THE TEMPLE REBUILT. A poem. By Frederick R. Abbe. A new edition, revised and enlarged. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. Price $1.25.

This is a poem filling 251 large 12mo pages. Its general scope and plan will remind the reader of such works as Milton's Paradise Lost, and Paradise regained. Pollock's Course of Time, and Blekersteth's "Yesterday, To-Day and Forever." Of the merit of the work we can not speak as we have not had opportunity for careful examination. The Publishers say: "Mr. Abbe is a poet in the truest sense of the word, and his subject is one which gives the largest opportunity for thought and expression. The poem involves the story of primal innocence, the fall of the soul, its restoration through Divine grace, and final salvation. By the "temple" the author typifies the soul of man; it is cast into ruins by sin; the new foundation is the plan of salvation as laid down by Christ; the builders are the Christian virtues and graces; the implements are prayer and good works; and through these the edifice again arises in its pristine purity and beauty. The author paints in vivid language the various scenes which rise before him during the progress of the poem; the bright radiance of the heavenly courts; the thronging seraphim and white-robed angels; the star-gemmed skies; the beautiful things of earth; the horrors of the pit, and the terrible scenes of the last day. The closing portion of the poem is entitled "Hallelujah," and is a call to all created things on earth and in heaven to praise the Lord for his redemption."

THE ROSEBUD MISSION BAND. By Mrs. S. E. Dowes. Boston: Howard Gannett.

Everything that helps to educate the children to do good, and that imbues them with the missionary spirit, and indicates practical methods of action, is to be commended. This book for these purposes is valuable. It is a story to interest children and also to impress upon them most important lessons. The volume is a 12mo, 185 pages. Price 75 cents.

Mr. Philip Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, can sell you a good Hale piano for $225, $75 cash and $10 monthly for fifteen months, no interest, including stool and cover. They are guaranteed for six years. This piano will be shipped to you on the condition if you are not suited there is to be no sale, and he pays all charges of freights. This is certainly very fair and shows the confidence that Mr. Werlein has in his pianos. A good organ with 9 stops will be sold for $75, payable $25 cash and $5 per month for ten months, if not satisfactory no sale. Write at once and supply your family with an instrument of one kind or another.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases, also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. THE WAYSIDE WELL.

BY WALTER LEARNED.

He stopped at the wayside well,
Where the water was cool and deep;
There were feathery ferns 'twixt the mossy stones,
And gray was the old well-sweep.

He left his carriage alone,
Nor could coachman or footman tell
Why the master stopped in the dusty road
To drink at the wayside well.

He swayed with his gloved hands
The well-sweep creaking and slow,
While from seam and scar in the bucket's side
The water splashed back below.

He lifted it to the curb,
And bent down to the bucket's brim,
No furrows of time or care had marked
The face that looked back at him.

He saw but a farmer's boy
As he stooped o'er the brim to drink,
And ruddy and tanned was the laughing face
That met his over the brink.

The eyes were sunny and clear,
And the brow unadorned by care,
While from under the brim of the old straw hat
Strayed curls of chestnut hair.

He turned away with a sigh
Nor could coachman or footman tell
Why the master stopped in his ride that day
To drink at the wayside well.

—Good Company.

ASHES.—The Pioneer Press says: What are the ashes which remain in our stoves after the stick of oak or maple is burned, or that are left in a blackened heap where once stood a straw stack after fire has been applied? We answer: They are the indestructible part of the wood or fibre—the mineral portion which has been extracted from the soil and absorbed by the growing plants. This earth of ours is a regular storehouse of potash and phosphorous, and soda, and magnesia, and lime, and silica, which is, by a wonderful process of nature, taken up by the rootlets of the plant and converted into wood, fibre and bark. Into everything in the shape of plant life go these minerals in greater or less degree to help make the stem and leaf and flower and fruit. The absence of any one in the soil diminishes, to a certain extent, the growth of the plant, and the general lack of all results in what is generally known as "worn out land." Every crop removed, therefore, takes with it a certain portion of these indispensable elements, which must, in time, be restored, or else impoverishment of soil ensues. Hence the application of manures and fertilizers, which contain, in an eminent degree, the elements of plant growth; hence the value of green crops turned under, which abound in potash and nitrogen and phosphorous in a large degree. It would seem, then, that if the ashes of a plant were restored to the soil on which they grew that they would tend in a large degree to revive the waste, and that burning of the straw on our wheat fields was not so bad a thing after all. Well, it is not, providing the burning can be made general all over the field and the ashes equally distributed. A large portion of the constituent elements have been permanently taken away, however, in the grain; yet, if the ashes of the straw could be as evenly spread as those of a prairie fire, the result would be equally as beneficial, for we all know that prairies which have been burned over produce sweeter and more luxuriant grasses, owing largely, no doubt, to the ashes which have been left upon them. Is it wise, then, to burn the straw on the fields? In some respects, yes, and in others, no. Yes, because ashes in any form applied to the soil are beneficial, and no, because if the straw was fed to stock or used for bedding, and thereby made into manure, its value as a fertilizer would be still further increased. We have been looking over some authorities on this subject, and find that everywhere ashes are commended. The old editor of the American Agriculturist, Mr. Lewis F. Allen says: "Don't waste even a pound of your ashes. Save them and apply to the soil at the rate of twelve to fifteen bushels to the acre on light soils, and twice that amount on heavy ones. All kinds of roots and grasses are especially benefited, and even if they have been leached apply them, as only a portion of the potash and soda have been removed." The Department of Agriculture for 1875 reports a case where, before the application of ashes, a certain field had only yielded 600 pounds of hay per acre. Ashes were freely put on in the fall and the yield the next season was increased to a ton. The next year the yield was a ton and a half, and for five successive years following the cut was over a ton per acre. The party had tried barnyard manure on the same field, but failed to reap as great a benefit as with the ashes. Harris, the author of "Walks and Talks About the Farm," says: "I use all the wood ashes I can get on my farm. It agrees with my land as well as manure does." And so we might go indefinitely giving illustrations, all proving the value of this fertilizer to the soil. For wheat lands it would probably be better that the straw be made into manure and thus applied, as ashes are not so quickly appropriated by wheat as they are by grass. It is a good deal better for the land, at any rate, to stack the straw and let the cattle feed from it, that it is to burn it in one heap in the centre of the field. Made into manure it is easily convertible into its original elements and, being washed into the soil by the rains, it is readily taken up by the rootlets of the growing plants. The moral of this brief article is, save not only your manure but your ashes. Restore to the soil in some shape that which you have taken from it or else pay the penalty in years to come in dwarfed and stinted crops. The ashes that are made in your stoves save and apply either to your meadows or grain fields. The ashes that have been leached save also and use in like manner. Don't be so wasteful. By and by your soil will cry out against you and answer back in stunted growths and diminished yields.

HOW TO DETECT WHETHER A HORSE IS SOUND-WINDED.—The principal diseases relating to this matter are "roaring" and "whistling," "broken wind" and "chronic cough." The only reliable method, which will positively determine whether or not a horse's wind is sound, is to have him put to exercise, either in pulling a heavy load or by galloping him. The latter is the usual test. However, the effect of either of these tests will be that, if the horse is a "roarer," it will be demonstrated to the listener. "Roaring" or "whistling" may be defined to be abnormal noise made during respiration, and according to the shrillness or the reverse of the sound, so is the animal said to "roar" or to "whistle;" the theory of the difference, and causes of the difference, in the sounds are various. "Broken wind" is an affection dependent on an emphysematous condition of the lungs. It is rarely seen in well-bred horses, but generally in heavy or coarse varieties. Its presence is made evident by a peculiar action of the abnormal muscles during respiration. Instead of a natural and equable lifting up and falling back of the flanks, there is a kind of double action; the ribs, during the expiratory movement, seem to fall suddenly with a jerk, and then the bank behind is drawn up—thus making the respiratory effort to consist of two distinct and separate actions, instead of one equally diffused contraction. A cough will also be present in the broken-winded horse, more particularly after certain kinds of diet, such as hay—a dry, husky cough, which hardly can be mistaken as indicative of any other affection. A horse may have a chronic cough from a variety of causes, and it will vary much in its sounds; sometimes soft, subdued and sore; at other times harsh and hard, and come on very often after drinking. One can not at any time, with certainty, say, simply from the character of the cough, that it is a chronic one, although the lack of any inflammatory condition of mucous membrane may confirm our suspicions. As a remedy for chronic cough, setons or rowels are often inserted between the branches of the lower jaw, or directly underneath the head of the windpipe. Any marks which this operation might leave should be carefully looked for and booked against the horse. A cough of any kind, and from any cause, makes the animal, for the time being, an unsound one, and it is impossible to say in what a cough might terminate. —Prairie Farmer.

FENCE OR NO FENCE.—In the early settling of this and other countries, the natural pastures were so valuable, and the proportion of land under cultivation was so small, that it was manifestly expedient that the crops should be protected by fences, so that the cattle and other stock might have free range. All things considered, such a system was the best that could be devised. It secured the greatest good to the greatest number. Fences could be built at small cost—scarcely more than the labor of splitting the rails. But in many sections of the country a great change has occured. The natural acreage has been greatly reduced in area, and become almost worthless as pastures; while at the same time the timber has almost disappeared. The relative position of the factors in the question has been completely transposed, and it is now time to establish and assert the original rights of the owner of the soil, and in many counties it will be found best for all to change the law, and require stock-owners to keep their animals within bounds.

It would not be wise, perhaps, for farmers to throw down their outside fences at once, and trust too implicity in the prompt observance of the law. Let each make proper arrangements for restraining his own stock within bounds, and be patient and forbearing towards the ignorant and indigent stock-owner.

We expect to see a prompt improvement in the condition of cattle and hogs and a brisk inquiry for better and purer breeds, in places having the stock law. Doubtless there will be at first a diminution in the number of cattle and hogs—as a large proportion are not worth their keep—to be followed by improvement in quality, and finally by increase in number beyond any statistics of the past.—J. R. Redding.

THE ASPARAGUS BED.—A correspondent inquires about how to make an asparagus bed. The work is not so great as old writers used to make it in their directions. It used to be said that one could not have good asparagus without digging out the soil to a depth of several feet, and filling the pit with well prepared soil and the richest fertilizers. But asparagus is grown by the acre, and of the finest quality, without any such system. The roots should be bought of any reliable nurseryman, and should be one or two years old, or the seed can be planted by the farmer at first where they are to remain. Early purchase and planting are preferable, as the plants sprout early. The land where it is proposed to plant asparagus should be strong soil or artificially well enriched. Plow several times, deeply, or dig in the same manner, and level the plot. Get the soil mellow and deeply pulverized; for when once set, the plants should not be disturbed for a long term of years. Plow or dig trenches a foot deep and three feet apart. Fill these trenches with mingled soil and manure, and set the roots of the asparagus fifteen inches apart in the rows. A little salt scattered along the row proves a good stimulant for asparagus, which, when found wild grows in low places near the sea.—Christian Observer.

AN EXPERIMENT IN POTATO PLANTING.—Last spring when planting the Beauty of Hebron potatoes, says a correspondent of the Rural New-Yorker, I planted one row through the piece as follows: I took potatoes below the medium size, cut off the seed and stem ends, cut out all the eyes but two; planted them and gave them the same care as the rest of the piece. The "seed" for the rest was of the same size potatoes cut in two and planted one piece in a hill about eighteen inches apart in the row. Now for the result: The first row, containing seventy hills, gave 195 pounds; one row by the side of it, with eighty-six hills, gave 113 pounds—a difference in yield per hill of over fifty per cent. in favor of the whole potatoes with two eyes. This row could be distinguished from the rest as far as the piece could be seen, until the dry weather dried up the vines. The whole piece yielded a splendid crop, as did a piece of snowflake in another part of the field.

ENRICHING ORCHARDS.—All the young fruit trees, says the Country Gentleman, which do not make a growth of two feet for the longest shoots in a season, need additional stimulating with manure if the ground is clean and well cultivated; or if they stand in grass or happen to be encumbered with weeds, good mellow cultivation must be given them. This is the rule for young trees, and the best time, if manure is applied, is late in autumn or during winter, the earlier the better. But manure appears to do the most good on bearing trees, especially apple trees, often giving good annual crops where poor and biennial crops were previously borne. Bearing trees need not grow so rapidly as young trees, but if they do not make annual shoots at least a foot long they need more manure, or both manure and cultivation. The manure may be spread broadcast in winter, covering the whole surface.

HOLSTEIN CATTLE.—The Holstein are especially a dairy breed and are growing in popularity. They mature early and are good feeders, and this, with their large milk yield and size, make them desirable for Western dairy farms.

HOW TO APPLY THE SODA REMEDY IN BURNS AND SCALDS.—It is now many years age (see the "London Medical Gazette" of March, 1844) that the author of this paper, while engaged in some investigations as to the qualities and effects of the alkalies in inflammations of the skin, etc., was fortunate enough to discover that a saline lotion, or saturated solution of the bicarbonated soda in either plain water or camphorated water, if applied speedily, or as soon as possible, to a burned or scalded part, was most effectual in immediately relieving the acute burning pain; and when the burn was only superficial or not severe, removing all pain in the course of a very short time; having also the great advantage of cleanliness, and, if applied at once, of preventing the usual consequences—a painful blistering of the skin, separation of the epidermis, and perhaps more or less of suppurration.

For this purpose, all that is necessary is to cut a piece of lint, or old soft rag, or even thick blotting paper, of a size sufficient to cover the burned or scalded parts, and to keep it constantly well wetted with the sedaic lotion so as to prevent its drying. By this means, it usually happens that all pain ceases in from a quarter to half an hour, or even in much less time.

When the main part of the limb, such as the hand and fore-arm or the foot and leg, has been burned, it is best, when practicable, to plunge the part at once into a jug, or pail, or other convenient vessel, filled with the soda lotion, and keep it there until the pain subsides; or the limb may be swathed or encircled with a surgeon's cotton bandage previously soaked in the saturated solution, and kept constantly wetted with it, the relief being usually immediate, provided the solution be saturated and cold.

What is now usually sold as bicarbonate of soda is what I have commonly used and recommended; although this is well known to vary much in quality according to where it is manufactured—but it will be found to answer the purpose, although probably Howard's is most to be depended on, the common carbonate being too caustic. It is believed that a large proportion of medical practitioners are still unaware of the remarkable qualities of this easily applied remedy, which recommends itself for obvious reasons.—F. Peppercorne, in Popular Science Monthly.

KEEP A BOTTLE OF LIME WATER.—If good milk disagrees with a child or grown person, lime water at the rate of three or four tablespoonfuls to the pint, mixed with the milk or taken after it, will usually help digestion and prevent flatulence. Lime water is a simple antacid, and is a little tonic. It often counteracts pain from acid fruits, from "wind in the stomach," and from acids produced by eating candies and other sweets; also "stomach-ache" (indigestion) from over-eating of any kind. A tablespoonful for a child of two years old, to a gill or more for an adult, is an ordinary dose, while considerable more will produce no serious injury. A pint of cold water dissolves less than ten grains of lime, and warm water still less. Pure lime water, even though pretty closely corked, soon deteriorates by carbonic acid in the air, which unites with the lime and settles as an insoluble carbonate. To have it always ready and good, and at no cost, put into a tall pint or quart glass bottle, of any kind, a gill or so of good lime just slaked with water. Then fill the bottle nearly full of rain or other pure water, and let it stand quietly, corking well. The lime will settle, leaving clear lime water at the top. Pour off gently as wanted, adding more water as needed. Some carbonic acid will enter, but the carbonate will settle, often upon the sides of a bottle, and freshly saturated water remain. The lime should be removed and a new supply put in once a year or so, unless kept very tightly corked.—American Agriculturist.

VARIOUS RECEIPTS.—Dried apples can be used for mince pies when it is impossible to procure fresh ones. Take nice, well dried fruit, soak it over night in cold water, chop fine and use in the same quantities as when the apples are fresh.

A little camphor rubbed over a cold-sore, when it first appears, will effectually prevent its becoming a disagreeable and unsightly blotch. It is best to give two or three applications to insure success.

A little saleratus rubbed on, with the finger or a bit of linen, will remove stains from cups and other articles of tableware. It will also removed spots from marbleized oil-cloths, and many stains from tinware.

A large picture ring screwed into the top of the handle, is the nicest thing made by which to hang up a broom. A strong screw, with a small head, should be placed in the wall at a proper height to receive it.

An easy and quite effectual plan to keep tinware from rusting consists in rubbing the new vessel inside and out with fresh lard or butter; then placing in the oven and keeping for several hours. The heat must not be so great as to melt the solder; still it is essential that the tin be kept very warm.

It is really a task to knit double heels in men's hose, and yet it pays, for they are warmer, and wear much longer. It is necessary to have more stitches than for an ordinary heel, and an extra one made after every fourth stitch is about right. Knit across on the right side and slip (pass from the left needle to the right without knitting) every third stitch. In passing back on the reverse side slip two stitches and knit the one slipped before. This forms a heel as thick and durable as can be do desired. —Country Gentlemen.

HOW TO WATER HANGING BASKETS.—Hanging baskets require frequent watering, to accomplish which, with due regard for the carpet beneath, they must commonly be taken down from their perches and then suspended elsewhere to dry.

This trouble may be avoided by a simple and inexpensive device, says the American Cultivator. Fill a bottle with water, into which insert the ends of two pieces of yarn, permitting the other end of each piece to hang down outside the bottle. The bottle should be suspended just above the basket and the water allowed to drip, which will follow in sufficient quantities to keep the earth moist.

NEURALGIA.—A very simple relief for neuralgia is to boil a handful of lobelia in half a pint of water till the strength is out of the herb, then strain it off and add a teaspoonful of salt. Wring a cloth out of the liquid as hot as possible, and spread it on the part affected. It acts like a charm. Change the cloth as soon as cold till the pain is gone; then cover the place with soft, dry covering till perspiration is over, so as to prevent taking cold.

Educational.

—The following extract from Fraser's Magazine affords an interesting glimpse of the methods pursued in German universities:

"The manner in lecturing is tolerably uniform throughout the German universities. The lecture-room is large and bare, with rows of desks and a raised seat at one end. Almost invariably every student is in his place before the quarter past the hour strikes. Punctually at the stroke of the quarter the professor enters, and almost before he is in his seat one hears the invariable introduction: 'Meine Herren.' If a student is late, he receives his reproof—not from the professor, but from the scraping boots of his fellow students. The common plan of lecturing is to spend about half an hour in tolerably rapid discussion of the subject, and the remaining quarter in deliberate dictation of a summary of the lecture. The advantages of this plan are obvious and it is surprising that it is not more adopted in England. If a professor lectures throughout slowly enough for his words to be taken down, the student feels that it would have been a great saving of time if the lecture had been printed. If, on the other hand, the lecturing is rapid throughout, the student's notes are disorderly and comparatively useless, and if it is a difficult subject the lecture has probably done him little good. As it is, a student's notes do not represent all that he has acquired; but so far as they go, they are perfectly orderly and complete. The notes are always taken not in books, but in small packets of paper stitched together, which can be added to according to need, and these manuscript notes (or 'heft' as they are called) are available not only for the student himself, but for any one studying the subject. One continually sees notices posted in a university: 'Wanted notes, of Prof. ——'s lectures for such and such a semester.' I have in my possession a considerable batch of notes of Prof. Lotze's lectures, copied in this way from the 'heft' of a fellow-student, and they are a perfect reproduction of the parts of his lectures dictated. I venture to doubt if any Oxford undergraduate's notes would have any such market-value."

—Cardinal Manning, speaking of the distribution of prizes to the students of Hammersmith Training College, said he was glad publicly to acknowledge that the Loudon School Board had always acted with perfect fairness to Catholic schools. He, however, declared that the religious education of the country was steadily declining. It had been, on the whole, good from 1847 to 1870; but since the latter date it had become less and less Christian. The one hope remaining was that Ireland was entirely Christian and Catholic and would stand as one man for denominational schools. Scotland, too, would adhere to its Protestant denominational schools, and so also would the Church of England. He urged that steps should be taken to obtain a royal commission on the whole subject.

ILLITERACY AND CRIME.—In a recent publication, by the U. S. Bureau of education, we find an interesting table showing the relation of crime to illiteracy in the departments of France. The table is taken from a late number of the Journal des Bibliotheques Populaires, and the information is reliable. From the aggregated results of the table it appears that out of the whole number of Criminals 3,365 arrested in the sixty-three departments of France, 1,480 were unable to read and write, 1,362 could read and write imperfectly, while 512 are reported as "reading and writing well." Only about 15 per cent. therefore of the number of criminals in France, during a year, are to be classed as having a common education, while 85 per cent. are illiterate.—Louisiana Journal of Education.

—The annual meeting of the Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of the University Education of Women, was held in Boston recently. The formal report declares that the success of the society's work is gratifying. State Universities and many professional schools and colleges offer openly their advantages to women, and the more conservative institutions are beginning to realize that the world does not stand still. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology last summer gave to two young women the degree of Bachelor of Science, and it is known that similar institutions are willing to receive women.

—Berea College, at Berea, Ky., has a total attendance in all departments of 402 students. The average age is 18, and of the whole number 280 are colored and 122 white, 221 are males and 178 females. The college is divided into collegiate and preparatory departments, the former claiming but 29 of the students. This department is sub divided into classical and literary courses. The faculty numbers thirteen and is under the presidency of the Rev. E. H. Fairchild.

—The minister of public instruction in Italy is preparing a project of law tending to make primary instruction obligatory. The same minister has asked the Chambers to fix the minimum salary of school-teachers at $200 a year. It is very doubtful whether this request will be granted, since it would increase the expenditure of the government by $3,000,000 a year. The total number of primary school teachers is 42,000.

—The school population of Wisconsin is estimated at 489,142. Of this number 296,428 during the past year attended the public schools and 24,024 the private schools. The state has 10,040 public school teachers and her school property is valued at $5,543,049 61. Her receipts for school purposes last year were $2,851,698 48 and her expenditures $2,303,038 34.

—It is argued in Virginia that, instead of establishing normal schools to supply sorely needed teachers, it would be wiser to utilize existing institutions and to add two or three normal professorships to the university, requiring also each academic professor to give normal instruction in the teaching of his own branch of knowledge.

—The directors of Girard College intend, it is reported, to organize a school of mechanical handiwork like that which is now in successful operation in Spring Garden Institute in Philadelphia. This school has from ninety to one hundred pupils in its work-rooms; and it has drawing classes with five hundred pupils.

—The managers of the Milwaukee Library have arranged a scheme for getting improving literature into the hands of school children. A series of biographies to be used as supplementary reading matter has been prepared for the pupils in the seventh and eighth grades.

—The gifts of Mr. George I. Seney, of Brooklyn, to Wesleyan University now amount to $550,000, and he proposes to give $100,000 more on condition that an equal sum be raised.

Pastoral Visits.

The increased demand for pastoral visits is not a bad indication. It is an evidence of an increased interest in the church, and a desire for a deeper work of grace among our members. No church can prosper financially, or spiritually without the aid of their spiritual advisers in the family, and any minister who fails to visit will loose largely himself. I never feel prepared to go into my pulpit on Sunday unless I have been with my flock during the week. My themes for Sunday are generally gathered from an observation of the wants of the members of my church, in my pastoral rounds.

But while it is encouraging to see a growing desire of our members for pastoral visits, can we not ask them kindly not to require too much of our time? They may destroy our general usefulness. All classes of members must be visited alike, but this is difficult to do. The home of a good warm hearted member, thoroughly devoted to the pastor and to God, with a charming family, a house of prayer and comfort, is one of the most delightful places on earth to the preacher. But there are others to be cared for, the indifferent professor must be seen, the careless stirred up, and those who belong to no church must be seen, and our backslidden members must forego the pleasures of many visits for the general good.

But there are brothers and sisters who never go amiss for pastoral visits. They are the halting, undecided, unsatisfied, unstable members, those who are constancly expressing an uneasiness, dissatisfied with their communion, and that they may leave their church and go to another, and probably carry others with them. They at once expose themselves and their families to the test, they are like disputed territory in times of war, claimed by both armies, belonging to none, preyed on by all. The preacher in charge of the church which they belong, feels it his duty to visit them, though he is greatly enjoyed while there; and ministers of other churches think there is game in the family for them, and they make it a point to visit oftener than their own flock. The door bell is kept hot, they come in with a round of smiles and are the agreeable, and seem to be quite a Chesterfield sort of fellows. They are unusually polite, get acquainted with all the children, think they are models of beauty, and predict that the bright eyed boy will be a minister. The church,—bow out very politely, lingering at the gate to assure them of a very pleasant visit and their certainty of return. And all at once this number finds a flock of friends, they belong to other churches, have been invited to call for a long time, give a general invitation to attend our church next Sunday—Doctor Boenergas is to preach—they go, enjoy the sermon, receive a great deal of attention shown them, and by this time the brother or sister hardly knows whether they are a member of any church or not; they begin to complain of their own church in which their fathers and mothers went to heaven, or are lingering on the shores of time, just ready for departure. They begin to doubt their baptism, or whether their ancestors were ever baptized; but there is one thing they do not doubt, and that is, they have been visited.

An amusing anecdote was related in one of our larger towns, in North Louisiana, I neither affirm or deny it. It was said that a lady, somewhat advanced in years, living on the hill, had decided to flee the wrath to come and be saved from her sins, and was inquiring as to what church she ought to join. The ladies of the catholic church heard of her determination, informed their priest, who was a venerable looking old gentleman with long silvery locks, who went at once to call upon the lady; he informed to her her duty, spoke of his church, and left satisfied that he had made a convert. The ladies of the Episcopal Church heard of the case, informed their rector, who was a young man, pleasant in manners and brilliant in conversation, but not very active of body. He saw the lady on the hill at once, passed a pleasant hour, discussed church and left assured that the following Sabbath she would add one to their numbers. The ladies of the Methodist Church with their usual vigilant ear and ear, heard of the lady, informed their pastor, who put his fat roan in a buggy, and neatly shaved and well dressed, he put off in haste to the village on the hill. His clear voice was heard at the gate, "Halloo, is Jamie —— at home?" Slowly she hobbles to the front. "I learn you are unwell, and thought a buggy ride might prove beneficial." "Yes," she feebly responded "that is just what I need." In she got, and away they went, down the river, out by the convent, back by the cemetery, up to the hills, down by the churches, rounded up at the cottage at sun down.—"I hope you enjoyed the visit madame." "Oh yes sir, I feel ten years younger, I am so much refreshed and so thankful." "Ah! by the way, Mrs. ——, are you a member of any church?" "No sir, but I wish to be." "Well then you can find none warmer hearted than the Methodists—join us." "Yes I will," and the next Lord's day she was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. She got three pastoral visits that week, can't say if she had any the next.

It seems then that one who is a firm, decided member of the church gets enough visits, while the undecided get too much.

Our good brothers and sisters must remember too, that we have our own domestic affairs to look after, food, clothing, shelter stock, garden, besides to prepare two sermons a week, our prayer meeting talk, and keep posted on secular and religious news. Let our members then be satisfied with a visit once a quarter.

THOS. J. HOUGH.

OPELOUSAS, Louisiana.

Letter from New Haven.

MR. EDITOR: It is said that "a thing begun is half done," and I am inclined to favor that opinion. When we can once prevail on ourselves to start the enterprise, whatever it may be, we may, in almost all instances, consider it as completed. I have been for many weeks thinking of writing to the ADVOCATE; but the effort required for that purpose, combined with the excuse that there is nothing of sufficient interest I can say to attract attention, have hitherto deterred me. I think, however, that there are many friends in New Orleans who will be glad to know how the cause, that is most dear to the hearts of all, is supported in this place. So far as I can judge, it has many earnest friends, "zealous of good works," and whose places will be one day occupied by their children. In the Sunday-school of the First Methodist Church are four hundred scholars gathered into forty classes, and taught by efficient teachers. The superintendent is also the organist of the church, and, perhaps, this is the reason that the choir is composed of boys from the Sunday-school. These boys are well trained and have sweet voices. There are about sixteen of them. There is no trouble with choir meetings to practice the tunes; for that is done on the spot, when the congregation is dismissed, in the morning and in the afternoon. The Sunday-school missionary anniversary was held a few weeks ago, and was conducted in a very pretty and graceful manner. The persons composing the audience were seated in convenient places; leaving room in the middle aisles for the children, who advanced from the room below, singing: "Onward, little soldiers." Their voices sounded very sweetly in the distance, and the melody was not deteriorated by a nearer approach when they had all occupied their alloted places. The superintendent, from the reading-desk, called the name of a class and read an appropriate verse from the Bible, while two delegates from that class walked to the front and deposited an offering of money and flowers. This form was repeated, with a different verse for each, until all the classes had responded and the envelopes had increased to quite a large pile, while the bouquets of flowers looked very beautiful as they were arranged in a cluster around the cross that was placed in the centre of the altar railing. An excellent address from the pastor followed; and the exercises were closed by singing: "From Greenland's icy mountains." The pastor's class for ladies is well attended, and the members are never at a loss for suitable language to give expression to their plans. Almost any one of them could examine for herself the duties of a class leader.

The Woman's Missionary Society is prospering, has a large membership, and, although the amount of each one's subscription is only two cents a week, still the treasury is equal to its demands, even to the support of a very good paper that has quite a large circulation. This church is certainly in a good condition, both financially and religiously. So, I believe, are all other churches in this city. The grandson of a Jewish rabbi delivered a lecture in this church some weeks ago. The subject: "The manners and customs of the Jews." It was interesting and instructive, and deserved a more numerous audience. He showed the "phylacteries" used by his people on the forehead and arm. They are like strings or thongs of leather, narrow and long. The one used for the arm is worn from above the elbow down to the tips of the fingers.

The winter has been unusually mild for this section of the country. The thermometer has only been a few degrees below zero, and that not often. Snow storms have not been frequent nor severe, and, consequently, not much sleighing, though sleighs were in great demand, and people enjoyed the amusement while it lasted. The tinkling of the bells have a merry sound, while the excitement of rapid motion imparts a pleasurable glow to the frame. But what shall I say of the snow, or where find an adjective that can express my admiration. As it lies on mountain and valley, hillside and meadow, its language is to the soul, lifting it to regions beyond, where the secrets of this wonderful creation of our Heavenly Father are hidden, perhaps, to be revealed at some future time.

The Charleston (S. C.) News publishes a letter from a correspondent, giving the particulars of a family remarkable for longevity. Wm. Smoak is 97 years old, and has living 10 children, 104 grandchildren, 391 great-grandchildren, and 79 great-great-grandchildren, making in all 575 descendants. They have lost 3 children, 35 grandchildren, 69 great-grandchildren, and 9 great-great-grandchildren, or 116 in all, making a total of 691 descendants. Both Wm. Smoak and his wife (who died a few years since) lived to see their youngest child a grandmother. Perhaps the most remarkable circumstance connected with this family is the fact that there is not, and has not been, a drunkard among them.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

ASK YOURSELF.

Does your system need nourishing and strengthening? Are you recovering from some low fever? Do you suffer from dyspepsia or indigestion? Are you troubled with any urinary disorder? Remember Brown's Iron Bitters will surely cure you. They have cured thousands who were given up to die by reputable physicians.

—The Missionary Review says that Canon Farrar is the son of a missionary to Western India, and was born on the banks of the Godavery, near Nassick. His father did excellent service in Bible translation.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

JACKSON, Miss., Feb. 28.—A heavy wind, rain and hail-storm visited this section this morning and extended south to Byram, Miss., where it was most violent. The depot building was entirely destroyed and other houses were injured. No lives were lost.

GOODMAN, Miss., Feb. 28.—A hurricane passed north of this place with most disastrous effects. Many houses were destroyed and people killed. The house of L. S. Doty was wiped out of existence, not a shred of furniture being left. The destruction of timber in the route of the storm is immense.

GREENVILLE, Miss., March 1.—There was a perfect wreck of Bolivar levee yesterday morning. The Riverton, Wade, Clay and Badgat levees broke through, and Concordia was reported broken the day before. These breaks will overflow every plantation in Bolivar county. The river fell here four inches last night and is still falling rapidly. Contrary to expectations, Williams Bayou levee is still held by Messrs. Smith, Hunt and other planters in the northern part of the county with their laborers, but the crevasse at Wade, when fully felt there, will probably break it and inundate the northern part of Washington. The Bolivar breaks will probably save the levees of Washington and Issaquena, but the loss to the district in levees alone is not than $150,000. The Clay and Badgat are the largest levees in the district except Hushpuckana. Several lives are reported lost. Rosedale, the country seat of Bolivar, is six feet under water. The Ledger office and other houses are washed away.

LATER.—Clarke's front levee, on Lake Bulah, is gone. This overflows what was left of Bolivar county. Williams Bayou levee in this country is broken as anticipated. All the northern Washington and the back lands througout Issaquena and Sharkey will go under. A number of people were drowned at Everton. The river is falling rapidly here. There was 8 inches fall to date. In addition to the breaks above stated was one at Hughes's front, between Wade and Clarke's. The accounts of suffering and loss of life continue to come, and exceed anything that has ever attended previous Mississippi river inundations.

MEMPHIS, March 1.—A special to the Appeal from Helena, Ark., says: The river did not rise here to-day, as expected. On the contrary, there was a decline from yesterday of one inch. The flood from the hills caused a rise near here, and as it passed off there was of course a fall. The river from water above, began rising to-night again, and will continue. A big break is reported in the levee just below Concordia, which occurred yesterday morning, and the people are panic stricken. Four negroes and one white man were drowned. C. W. Blackburn, of Laconia Circle, arrived to-day and is negotiating for a steamer to remove stock and people from that flooded district. He says many negroes are starving, others are feeding on putrid carcasses of drowned cattle and such game as can be procured. Whole families are subsisting on half a peck of meal per week. The people of this section are offering milch cows at 25 cents per head, as the poor beasts are dying from starvation.

WASHINGTON, March 2.—The nomination of Roscoe Conkling to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court was confirmed by the Senate this afternoon. Thirty-nine votes were cast in the affirmative and twelve in the negative.

VICKSBURG, March 3.—A special to the Vicksburg Herald from Greenville says: Our front is now our rear. The water from the Bolivar breaks is rapidly encroaching on the town limits. Fifty convicts are at work, but our security from partial overflow is by no means assured. The back water is higher than in 1874 or any other year. It is thought it will go over all of the Deer Creek country except the highest land in the Bogue settlements. Many of the inhabitants are reported to be in the trees. Boats have been or will be sent to their rescue. Reports from Lake Providence state that the river has fallen six inches during the past three days, and that the break at Longwood, La., near Lake Providence, has been closed.

DES MOINES, Ia., March 3.—After much debate the State Senate has agreed to a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The measure now goes before the people.

ABERDEEN, March 3.—W. R. Jones, white and Bill Miller, colored, were hanged here, at noon to-day for the murder of the Walker brothers, near this place in November last. Fully 4000 people witnessed the execution. Up to to-day Miller seemed indifferent to his fate, but on the gallows he showed intense fear and excitement, but made no statement.

MEMPHIS, March 3.—The river at this point has declined one inch since 6 o'clock this morning, when it marked 35 feet 10 inches on the gauge. Twenty-eight miles of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad, across the river, are under water. Chief Engineer Flemming, with a large force of laborers, are at work saving the track from washing away. A large number of people continue coming to Memphis from the Arkansas side, being forced by back water to leave their homes.

VICKSBURG, March 4.—The following is the latest news we have of the size of the various breaks above: At Esston's, from 100 to 120 yards wide; at Catfish Point, 50 feet on the 27th and widening rapidly; at Clay and Bayot's, 100 yards; at Miles's, two breaks width not known; at Riverton and Concordia the breaks are very wide, but the exact width is not known.

GREENVILLE, Miss., March 6.—The back water is still rising and spreading. It is now from six inches to a foot higher than any previous overflow since the country was first settled. There will be very little land above water from the river front to the hills beyond the Yazoo. Greenville is secure from any possible overflow, though the low points were at one time threatened. Refugees from the overflowed plantations are congregating here and ... are severely taxed. So far the relief agents have not communicated with our local authorities. Our Board of Supervisors is now in session and has some of the government aid to be sent here. The need is immediate. The Sheriff of Bolivar has been here to lodge his prisoners in jail. He reports that there are very few plantations in his county with even a strip of land above water, consequently the loss of stock there will be almost total. The levees are thronged with negroes and stock, whose condition is most deplorable. As its extent becomes appreciated, this calamity begins to appal. The tax to rebuild the levees above would be almost insupportable; but that is only an item. Laborers have lost their stock and movables, and are in a panic-stricken and demoralized condition. There would be an exodus from here to the hills could transportation be secured.

MEMPHIS, March 6.—The river here became stationary at noon and since then has declined perhaps half an inch, with 36 feet on the gauge. The rise of 4 inches since Saturday night was caused by local rains. Commissioners Mangum, of Arkansas, and Hemingway, of Mississippi, sent supplies this afternoon to points on both sides of the river between here and Greenville, Miss. Every day brings intelligence of widespread sufferings and of the destitute condition within the inundated region.

WASHINGTON, March 6.—Mr. Scoville has submitted to District Attorney Corkhill a bill of exceptions in the Guiteau case. The District Attorney said to-day that it is a voluminous document and will require several days in examination. He added that he would certainly complete the examination by the end of the present week. Although Mr. Scoville could not be found this morning, there is no doubt that up to the present time nothing has been received to indicate that Gen. Butler will enter the case as counsel for the assasin. Warden Crocker, of the district jail, says that he is positive that up to Saturday night Guiteau had no information to the effect that either Butler or Merrick would come to his assistance. The Warden also said that to the best of his knowledge nothing had been heard to-day from either of the gentlemen mentioned.

President Arthur has received from Mr. Conkling a letter declining the Associate Justiceship of the the Supreme Court.

Mr. Vest, from the Committee on Commerce, to-day reported to the Senate bill incorporating the Inter-Oceanic Ship Railway Company, generally known as the Eads bill, which was accompanied by a report from the committee recommending its passage.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, March 2.—There was a large crowd of spectators awaiting the Queen's arrival at Windsor. The Queen walked across the platform of the railway station to her carriage which was in waiting to take her to the Castle. John Brown had already ascended to his seat behind the carriage, when a man standing at the entrance to the station yard, among a number of spectators, pointed a pistol at the carriage and fired. To judge from the report the pistol was not heavily loaded. The Queen, who was probably not aware what had happened, was immediately driven to the Castle, but before she passed the man had been seized by the Superintendent of the Borough police, who was standing near by. He was also violently seized by the crowd, and was only rescued from them when three or four policemen came to the superintendent's assistance. The pistol was captured by one of the crowd. MacLean who was miserably clad, was taken into High street and thence conveyed to the police station in a cab. MacLean is said to be an inhabitant of South Sea. The general opinion is that this act was the result of lunacy. The report of the pistol was sharp, but not loud. MacLean apparently intended firing again, when the revolver, which seemed to be a new one was knocked from his hand by a bystander and handed to the police. Eton scholars were prominent in the attempt to lynch MacLean. It is understood the Queen has not sustained any shock.

The Russo-Jewish committee has prepared a statement confirming the report of outrages on Jews in Russia, including many cases of murder and rape, which the recent British consular reports discredited. The committee's statement is founded on letters received from persons occupying high official positions in the Jewish community and upon personal evidence of Jewish refugees. A letter from an eminent rabbi indicates that steps have been taken by the Russian authorities to conceal the truth.

The farmer who was attacked in his house and shot through the legs by a party of armed men at Foacle, county Clare, Ireland, on Tuesday last, has died of his injuries. Nineteen persons in that vicinity have been arrested under the coercion act.

LONDON, March 3.—MacLean was charged at the police station with shooting at the Queen with intent to do grievious bodily harm. He asked whether any one was hurt, but the police refused to give him any information. After searching the yard at the railway station for an hour this morning, the police found a small bullet embedded in the ground. It bore marks of having first struck some other object. It was right in the direction of the spot over which the Queen's carriage was passing, having probably passed over the horses' heads. The Queen and Princess Beatrice walked on the castle terrace as usual early this morning. The charges against MacLean before the Windsor magistrates to-day was shooting at the Queen with intent to murder. The prisoner was remanded for a week. Formal evidence was taken concerning the prisoner's arrest, and the finding of the bullet.

LONDON, March 4.—Police have ascertained that MacLean was formerly in the Well's Lunatic Asylum, and only discharged in September last. It is reported that MacLean bears himself cheerfully and sings in his cell. Almost the universal opinion in England seems to be that MacLean is a lunatic.

LONDON, March 6.—MacLean the would-be assasin of the Queen, was quietly removed Saturday to Reading jail. The solicitor of his family writes that he possesses certificates of eminent physicians, Maudsley and Godfrieb, of the existence of mental amberration in the prisoner of long standing, and that he has no hesitation in saying that there will be no difficulty in establishing the fact of his insanity. He adds that it is true that the prisoner is the same person who attempted to wreck a railroad train in 1871, and that he was formerly confined in Wells's Asylum, but that it is untrue that two doctors of Windsor had declared him sane.

PRIZES OF THE DEEP.—The whale which has been seen in these waters several times lately has been captured and killed by the whaling schooner Lotta Cook, and now lies in deep water near Dankuskie beach. The crew of the vessel named are at work reducing the monster to oil and obtaining the whalebone to manufacture fashionable corsets. It is estimated that she will produce about 90 barrels of oil. Her calf is near the vicinity, and occasionally approaches its dead mother, and the whalers are confident of capturing it, as it came sufficiently close on Saturday to have been killed. The men were, however, not enabled to use their boats at the time and it escaped. The calf is of large size, and it is estimated will produce about fifteen barrels of oil. The presence of these "Jonah swallowers" in our waters promises to prove a bonanza to some cruisers as it is estimated that the oil from an average size one will yield about $3,000.

Since the capture of the one above noted we learn that on Wednesday last a whaling schooner, which has been cruising around Brunswick and St Simons Island on the look-out for these leviathans of the deep, succeded in coming across a huge fellow near the island, which they killed and captured, and are now busily employed reducing the flesh to oil. We are informed that it is expected fully one hundred barrels will be obtained.

The method employed in dispatching these monsters now is more rapid and attended with less danger than formerly. A harpoon is driven into the body with a small torpedo attached which explodes inside, making a fearful wound that quickly produces death. The lifeless body is then hauled to the side of the vessel, when ropes are tied around it near the head and tail and secured to the masts. The carcass is cut in large square pieces with a sharp instrument, shaped like a spade. These pieces are hauled upon deck with a block and tackle and the flesh boiled down to oil.

Large numbers of people from Brunswick went to St. Simon's in boats to get a look at the dead monster and some of them were towed back to Brunswick on her outward trip by the steamer David Clarke.—Savannah News.

West Virginia is going to have the most accommodating railroad on record, if it keeps its promises. It is trying to obtain right of way from the farmers whose fields are to be cut by its line, and instead of paying cash damages the company pledges that at least one train a day each way shall stop on each farm to take up or put off passengers or freight, provided a signal is displayed. If it is a prosperous farming region that train will be as pleasant to travel on as a cross-town bob-tail horse-car.

Mr. Horace Sevvill, of Altoona, Pa., says: "My wife and I are upward of seventy years of age. Of late we both have begun to feel the infirmities of old age. Nothing seems to revive, exhilarate, and strengthen us, as does Brown's Iron Bitters. We would not do without it for ten times its cost."

NOTICE:—The District Conference of the New Orleans district, Louisiana Annual Conference Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will hold its next Session in the City of Baton Rouge, Thursday, April 13, 1882, at 4 P. M., in the Methodist Church. The preachers of the district will please come prepared to pay over their collection for Bishops and General Conference Delegates; also to turn over their Quarterly Conference Journals, to Committee of Examiners.

A WONDERFUL and

SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERY

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.

2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.

3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

THE ITINERANT.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE BISHOP.

The work was a trying one, Bishop,
To body as well as on brains;
But I, as I never had known it before,
Have learned how the gospel sustains.
The appointment was hard to me, Bishop,
I heard it, believe me, with tears—
Not that I "dreaded the labor,"
I was only because of my years.
But now every shadow is rifted,
And light flashes down on my eyes,
And I look on the year that is closing,
As a series of steps to the skies.

I've labored through bleakness of winter,
Through spring and through summer and fall,
And preached in the mountains and valleys,
Proclaiming the Saviour to all.
I preached not "the words of men's wisdom,"
But earnestly sought to unfold
The old-fashioned story of Jesus—
I followed the preachers of old.
Farewell!"—I wish you had seen them—
For souls were converted in throngs,
And, Bishop, we held to the landmarks—
The altar and old-fashioned songs.

We buried some noble ones, Bishop,
Have gone with the Master to dwell,
The fathers and mothers in Zion—
Thank God, our "people die well!"
We passed o'er the highlands of heaven,
As calm as the day at its close
Floats over the peak of the mountains
Their spirits with Jesus repose.
But, Bishop, the deepest of sorrow
That ever has stricken my heart,
Was death in the parsonage circle—
Excuse me—I notice you start.
You'll pardon me, please, for this emotion,
I know that my language is wild,
But never, I can not prevent it—
I speak of the death of my child.
I wish you had been with her, Bishop—
She talked so of "Jesus" and "love,"
And truly it seemed that the angels
Had come to convey her above.
She suffered her pain like a martyr,
Was patient and calm to the last,
Then, soft as the breath of an angel,
Her spirit to Paradise passed.

We buried her under the willows,
Where the daisies and violets bloom,
But, Bishop, the Spirit was present,
And there at the little one's tomb
Was that a comfort was given
More precious than ever before,
Is there one in comfort like Jesus
The heart that is burdened and sore.

You asked of my "salary," Bishop—
It is hardly deserving the name;
Allowance," the Discipline calls it,
No matter—it's nearly the same.
My people have paid me but little,
Indeed they have little to give;
And now as the year I'm reviewing,
I wonder we managed to live.
We practiced economy always,
And lived in the lowliest way,
And trusted the God of Elijah,
Who sent us the ravens each day.
My wife, in the trials and sorrows,
God bless her! stood firm at my side,
And said with a faith apostolic—
"I know that the Lord will provide."

I've been a hard time of it, Bishop,
But still, there's a word I must say—
I want to go back to the circuit,
My duty is pointing that way.
I'm saving the souls of the people,
My preaching, tho' humble, is blest;
I'm willing to labor among them;
I'll find in the future my rest.
I'm ready to bear and to suffer
The work and the pain and the cross;
They'll brighten the future before me,
What matters my temporal loss?
And then there's another thought, Bishop—
It's a wife, as I said, is so brave,
I think it would very near kill her,
To leave our little one's grave!

I've talked a long time to you, Bishop—
I thank you for hearing me through;
I pray that the hand of the Master
May lead in whatever you do!

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

First Quarter—Lesson XII.

SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1882.—MARK v, 21-43.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Be not afraid, only believe."

POWER OVER DISEASES AND POWER OVER DEATH.

The eager welcome of those who were waiting for Jesus on the western shore was in striking contrast to the deliberate rejection of the Gadarenes, who came out in crowds to pray for him to depart out of their coasts. The welcome and rejection were both the result of the same spirit of selfishness; the Gadarenes were looking out for their interests when they bade him depart, and these waiting Galileans, to further their own comfort and welfare, longed him upon his return from the other shore. Had this multitude, who had heard him so respectfully and patiently the evening before, and had watched so eagerly for his return, only known why he so unceremoniously left them on the shore, unhealed and disappointed, they might have been loud in their complaints against him. He had left this multitude, of his own people, who had gathered to hear his words, and have the benefit of his healing power to go over to one poor heathen man possessed of devils. He left a multitude to attend one, and that one not of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but a foreigner. This was seemingly a great waste of precious time, a neglecting of hundreds to serve one who had no claim on him. They would have complained that this was taking the children's bread and casting it to the dogs. But they did not know why he left them. Jesus was a strong believer in foreign missions. He was ever leaving the many at home to serve the few far away. Let this sudden journey to Gadara to save one, and this strange leaving of listening thousands, testify for the Good Shepherd, who ever leaves the ninety-and-nine to seek the one lost. Oh! ye professed followers of Jesus who object to foreign missions, and, under the name of charity, betray him; and, like another of his followers, ask: "For what purpose this waste?" Why spend this money in extravagant folly, which could give so much relief to our poor at home? Oh! Christians without the Spirit of your Lord, beware how you object to foreign missions on principle, for sooner or later your principles will be discovered to be bad ones. There is no guage of true discipleship like this. Foreign missions is the spiritometer which can test the spirituality of a church or an individual to within the smallest decimal of a fraction.

Among the first and most importunate of those who were waiting for Jesus was Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, whose only daughter was lying at the point of death. Christ had but arrived at his home near the sea when, with the multitude of applicants for aid, came this father beseeching Jesus to come at once and lay his hands upon his dying child, and heal her. "He fell at his feet, and besought him greatly: My little daughter lieth at the point of death; come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed, and she shall live."

As if the case would admit of no delay, Jesus at once went with him, the people following and thronging him to see what would be the result of Jairus' visit. In this crowd there was a certain woman which had an issue of blood twelve years, and had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, when she had heard of Jesus, came in the press behind, and touched his garment. For she said, "If I may touch but his clothes I shall be whole," and straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up, and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague. This was, so to speak, an overflow miracle by the way. The Master was on the way to work a greater miracle, even to raise the dead, and as he proceeded he was gathering up power, not that there was not in him always present supreme power to accomplish what he willed, but there were conditions in men to be supplied which were necessary to the putting forth of his power. Unbelief must be dissipated, and the condition of trust in himself be superinduced, and this intermediate miracle was to prepare and educate the father at least to a greater faith, which he would need when the announcement should reach him that his sick daughter was dead. This miracle was a letting out of a sample of his power, and prepared the father to exercise a greater faith, just as the quelling the storm prepared the disciples to be witnesses of the quelling of a greater storm in a human breast.

It was for this reason that the Master called out the woman, and made her declare the workings of her faith in him.

That which seems at first to be an interruption and delay to the original purpose, when we come to examine, is found to be all of one piece, and in direct line to the accomplishment of the original purpose, viz.: the raising of Jairus' daughter. This illustration of his power to heal an incurable disease was an argument presumptive of his power over death—the last result of disease. His healing the woman of that plague, and his after and greater healing of the woman's soul, when he tells her to "go in peace, thy faith hath made thee whole," illustrated the difference of power necessary between healing the dying and raising the dead.

Seemingly there was delay, fatal delay. How long these moments of delay must have seemed to Jairus, but not a moment sooner could the work have been done; a long tarrying, and yet a speedy deliverance; for, just so far as the resurrection from the dead is a mightier miracle than the healing of the sick, just so far did the delay enhance and illustrate the glory of his mission.

The lesson is crowded with other beautiful and comforting spiritual truths, but the one theme our lesson would bring out is his power over disease and power over death; this is wonderfully brought out in the two miracles, and the instrument by which we may appropriate this power is faith. Only believe.

Have we Failed in our Duty to the Colored People?

BY W. T. J. SULLIVAN, D. D.

MR. EDITOR: Have the Southern Methodist people, either as an organized church or as Christian citizens, really failed to do their duty to the colored people in the South? I have been from my youth up an eye witness of the affair between the whites and blacks in Mississippi, and I presume what has occurred in this State fairly represents the case in the whole South. Our church has no reason to be ashamed of the results of the labors she bestowed before and during the war, or the Christian service rendered to these black people. While they were held as slaves, they were at the same time numbered as parts of our families and received the personal, social and religious attention which their relation and the civil laws allowed. This attention included their organization into distinct societies within our church; preaching to them through missionaries appointed for their special service, and through the pastors of white congregations and through our local preachers; organizing Sunday-schools in which, not only the preachers, but many of our best men and women, took an active and constant part. Of their own number, also, proper men were licensed to preach and to hold minor services in accordance with our rules. All this work, resulting in the conversion of thousands of this race and their gradual elevation in the scale of Christian civilization, forming, too, the basis of whatever improvement in them has since been realized, was going on in its substantial energies and its consecrated aims when the emancipation proclamation was promulgated. Northern religionists and Northern politicians co-operating, took at once this emancipated race into their own careful hands and yearning hearts. The agents of religious societies rushed into the districts opened to them by the advancing Federal forces, and gathered the negroes together under new ecclesiastical organizations and proceeded to instruct them in the principles and arts of personal, social, political and religious independence—an independence which was to express itself, on the one hand, by acknowledging and submitting to the power and the people who had freed them from slavery, and, on the other, by separation, as far as possible, from control, influence or advice of Southern people. An example of this occurred in a community remarkable for the wealth, culture and noble-mindedness of its people, and in which the case between the whites and blacks of the South had been fairly represented; especially so far as Southern Methodists are involved. In that community there was an ample house in which whites and blacks met together on Sunday mornings for worship—the whites below, and the blacks in the large gallery. On Sunday afternoons, once or twice a month, the same preacher preached in the same house to full congregations of blacks. Three miles away, in a house built for the purpose by a noble prince in our Israel, and a prince among men, on his own ground and for his own and his neighbors' servants, this same preacher, a member of the Mississippi Conference, preached on Sunday afternoons to another congregation of blacks. And this Christian labor for that people might have gone on perpetually whether the negroes were slaves or free. But, in one single day those two congregations were swept away from their accustomed habitudes and from that pastor's hands with all the material, moral and religious circumstances necessary to make the separation complete. This was done by a stranger very much in the way we would suppose a missionary would act when he is leading a multitude of idolaters to Christianity. It was easy to see, and is still easy to see, how natural it was for the negro to take the course he did. The white people have followed him with sympathy, interest and pity; the Southern people alone knew and know him. But he had allowed himself to be, not only turned away from this people, but to be turned against them. True, this attitude was not malicious and vengeful; it was rather a morbid, ignorant fear of falling back into the old bondage, or a worse despotism coupled with the equally morbid and ignorant hope that all his wild imaginations of freedom would be secured by his liberators. He fell into the hands of instructors and managers who taught him to regard every offer of instruction and advice from a Southern man as a bland attempt at the overthrow of negro independence. Only such material was allowed as would set the black man up in full possession of his anticipated ease and plenty. The black man was taught to make his politics and his religion coincident and co-operative. We all know what a tremendous power his church assemblies have been in fomenting the political enormities in which he was made the willing but ignorant tool. The case was this then: The colored people left the Southern Methodist Church; left her ministry, her counsel, her government, and clamored for freedom, and all the marks of its assertion; hence insisted on a church in which they should have its conduct in their own hands and draw its ministry from their own ranks; their religious and political attitude towards the Southern people effectually blocked the way against the efforts we were ready to make for their improvement. I say were ready to make, for I do not believe the Southern Methodist Church or people have yet seen the day when they were unwilling to do what they could do for the proper benefit of the colored people. That people have been full of suspicion and a thousand horrid prejudices that made it impossible for us to reach their hearts or their manners; hence it has been best to let them alone and wait, ready for such opportunities to do them good as the changes of time might present. This we have done. Can it be that we have slept the sleep of indifference for eighteen years and have just waked up to find ourselves confronted with the awful responsibility of taking care of this colored race? Can it be possible that we have been blind with hate or malice or prejudice towards this people, so that we could not see our duty and its occasion? Neither of these, my brother; neither; but the fearful wall that was built between the races—not of our building. And now, if time has broken down that wall and opened the fields into which we may pass to labor for the improvement and salvation of that people, we will rejoice with exceeding great joy, and we will work with hearty good-will as our gracious Lord shall help. If any brother sees the wall shaking; or sees here and there breaches made in it; or has found means of scaling it, there is no objection to his lifting up his voice to proclaim the glad tidings, and to tell us of the dawn of a new and better day, of the departure of a long and weary night of tearful and wasting struggles; but let not that voice have in it a tone or breath of accusation against this Southern Methodist people, whose fidelity to their trusts is attested by a history as glorious as it is reverent, and true, glorious in the facts of our bearing and forbearing, our persistent efforts and purpose to do right, cleave to the cross and leave the issue with God. The fields are beginning to appear white unto the harvest, not because we are just opening our eyes, but because the day is beginning to dawn. We can not ignore our history, nor ought we to do so; for that history reveals the principles and forces that have combined to produce the facts of to-day. We can not know these facts without the light of that history. "The living present" has its birth from the womb of that mysterious maternity. We may address ourselves to all the duties of the present hour, while, at the same time, we keep in sacred memory the bitter and the glorious history of the Southern people for the past twenty-two years. We need not abandon one fundamental principle, nor cast a slur upon any act distinctive of the Southern people, in order to fit ourselves for the utmost activity in the demands which God makes upon us to-day. The Southern people have done a great deal for the colored people incidentally, in resisting false political creeds, in saving the country from negro rule, and thus securing civil and social, as well as industrial, salvation; also in devising and supporting a system of common schools, and founding some collegiate schools, in which the colored people share equal benefits with the whites. In the general view of the case the Southern Methodist people are not at fault towards the "brother in black."

Short Articles on Providence—No. 2.

I closed my first paper with an emphatic non credo to the monstrous doctrine that Providence ordered all the villainies and wrongs of the slave trade and slavery that the African might be Christianized by contact with the white man. This is complimentary to the white man, but rather left-handed to Providence and the negro. But I am aware that a system of negations and unbeliefs is as objectionable as all the horrid dogmas of Augustine and Calvin. God does play a part in the world's drama. He had something to do with the negro's getting to America. But that it was for a particular purpose, as I may imagine, is more than I am ready to take for granted. The negro may, and many of them do, believe that he is the conservator of the white man's destiny. He does not publish so many theories as to how to dispose of this white man question which Providence has given him to solve; but he is at work in his way to solve it. He believes the white man is here for a wise and beneficent purpose, and his contact with the chosen race, whose bondage is canonical, will inure largely to his cranial development and instruction in the faith once delivered to the saints! It was exceedingly wise in Providence (he being judge) to contrive such a convenience as the white man! If he has no meat, he has only to step round to the white man who has a pig ready fattened; if he wants a chicken, the Lord has provided a white man's hen-roost close by. If he has starved and ridden to death the mule of last year, there is the white man to furnish another. I do not see wherein the negro's theory of Providence in the white man is not as good as Dr. Kelley's in the negro.

I shall not dogmatize as to the purposes of Providence. But I may safely say that Providence will never violate law, nor suffer it to be done if he can prevent it, and man's free agency be preserved. Providence is never in collusion with the violators of law. Permission when applied to Providence is simply Divine silence after all expostulation has been in vain; just as conscience unheeded by headstrong passion is in that moment of passion unheard. When man commits crimes or blunders in direct violation of Divine law, Providence never appears therein to approve the blunder or to sanction the crime, but to save the wreck which man has made. His glory is not to plan a long and tortuous course of folly or crime in order to show his wisdom and grace; but his wisdom and grace come as the hospital corps to bring away and bind up the wounds of the sufferers. If these views of Providence be correct (and I think it will take an "iron jacket" to deny), we shall come to the conclusion that all the evil that has been connected with the slavery question, and whatever has grown out of it, was man's work, and not the ordination of Providence. Though the Divine curse was upon the slave trader, God did not forget that the slave was a subject of his care. This we might argue by several modes of such special pleading as Dr. Kelley uses. For example: Providence saw that the negroes could not live under an English or New England master; so he made the Yankee and English skippers bring him to our genial Southern climate, and put him under our humane and indulgent Southern gentlemen. Now, some of our Southern people honestly believe that. We are sure God did not forget the slave; but did he shun putting him under the tutelage of Yankees and Englishmen? We know that he did not do it; but his reason for not doing it is an open question. Evidently there was a reason for bringing the negro South, and that it was merciful so to do would appear negatively from the additional fact, that at the South the Indian has not been so rapidly and murderously exterminated as along the Northern belt. Still these reasons are only apparent. We can not dogmatize in regard to reasons from facts that have the range of plus and minus infinity.

There is one fact, which so far as I have read, has been uniformly and invariably overlooked or ignored, and yet it is an important fact. It is this: The negro in being transported from Africa was not a loser in either personal dignity or comfort or privileges, further than his savage idleness. His food, clothing and shelter were better by far; and, if his savage freedom was restricted, his life was safer, and his services brought him personally as large a return as he had in his own land. All the poetry as to what he left behind is sentiment, such as might be indulged in at the catching of every wild mustang on the Texas prairies. Providence has as much to do in catching the mustang as he had in kidnapping Guinea negroes. But if the negro is kidnapped, Providence will still take care of him. The fourth and fifth generation of slaves had far more personal dignity than their free ancestors. I believe this arose from two causes besides that which Dr. Kelley states: 1. The regular labor intelligently done to secure certain results developed muscle and brain together. 2. The more wholesome food and better clothing brought out a physique and brain of larger proportion. The most of original Africans were bow-legged dwarfs; what finer specimens of physical manhood can be found now in America than among the unmixed descendants of those dwarfs? But this development was due to the enforced obedience to that law, which God gave to mind and body at creation, rather than to a Providence that broke his own moral rules to secure a spiritual blessing to two sinners—one a Christian, and the other a heathen savage!

Here endeth the second lesson.

Bishop Wightman.

LAST HOURS—THE FUNERAL.

We quote as follows from editorial of the Southern Christian Advocate:

But a short time before his decease, we claimed the privilege of conversing with him about the prospects that lay before him in the event of his early death. Said the dying man: "If it were God's will that I should yet be spared a while longer to be with my family and serve the church, I should be gratified; but to whatever may be his will I bow with supreme submission—willing to stay, ready to go."

When some one asked him if it should please God to raise him up and he should be allowed to preach again, what text he would take, he promptly answered: "The very God of peace sanctify you wholly, and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." He constantly became more and more heavenly-minded as he went down into the dark valley, and though his protracted illness entailed so much suffering, we feel like glorifying God in him, to a degree we might not have done, had his affliction not been as great, nor had it not so greatly illustrated the grace of our sympathetic Lord.

On Sunday before his death, Wednesday at three o'clock in the morning, he had family prayer for the last time, his loved ones kneeling round his bed while he led the devotions. On Monday night, his life-long friend, the venerable H. A. Walker, Dr. Meynardie, and his beloved and faithful wife, together conducted a service at his bed-side. Bro. Walker prayed, Sister Wightman then sang, and Dr. Meynardie then followed in prayer. The Bishop took the liveliest interest in the services, responding intelligently and with evident emotion. All day on Tuesday he was in something of a comatose state, arousing up for a few moments at intervals. To his brother-in-law, Bro. Walker, he spoke most piously of his indebtedness to the goodness and mercy of God in the comparative comfort which he had in his dying hours. On Tuesday night Dr. Meynardie prayed with him—a prayer of unusual fervor and simplicity and power. This was the last service offered at his bed-side. After this he continued to grow weaker and weaker, till at the last he fell sweetly asleep.

"Jesus, lover of my soul!"

Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep.

The services over the remains of the Bishop at Trinity Church, on Thursday, the sixteenth instant, were attended by a large congregation, among whom were the ministers of the various city churches and many prominent business and professional men. St. Michael's bell was tolled from eleven A. M. to one P. M. in memory of the deceased. The casket in which the remains were enclosed was made of polished black walnut, heavily mounted with silver, and was literally covered with floral tributes. The following gentlemen acted as pall-bearers:

Senior—George W. Williams, Dr. J. R. Mood, F. J. Pelzer F. W. Capers, William McBurney, W. A. Courtenay, R. W. Burnham, Dr. H. Baer, Dr. Middleton, Michel and S. A. Nelson.

Junior—Harvey Cogswell, J. A. Chamberlain, C. H. Muckenfuss, George W. Williams Jr., J. J. Westcott, Fred Cross, W. H. Flint and Herbert F. Moore.

The interior of Trinity Church was completely draped in mourning, the gallery, rails, pillars, altar rails, pulpit and brackets being enfolded in black cloth. The large stained glass window back of the pulpit was heavily curtained with black cloth, and the raised dais on which the pulpit stood was draped in the same material, the heavy folds of the cloth being caught up at intervals with rosettes and knots of crape. The altar immediately in front of the pulpit was occupied by the officiating clergymen.

At 11 o'clock the funeral cortege reached the church, and the casket containing the remains was borne within the walls where the voice of the lamented dead had so often been heard pleading the cause of the Master he served so well and long. The services were opened with the hymn "Nearer My God, to Thee," sung by a trio with organ accompaniment. The Rev. P. W. Monzon, the Presiding Elder of the District, then announced the hymn, "Jesus Lover of my Soul," which was sung by the whole congregation, the choir leading. This was followed by selections from the Scriptures, read by the Rev. D. J. Simmons and the Rev. S. A. Weber, and after another hymn, the services at the church were concluded with prayer by Rev. D. J. Meynardie. The remains were then conveyed to Magnolia Cemetery, where, after the reading of the burial service, they were committed to their last resting place in that beautiful "City of the Dead."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Mississippi Conference Woman's Missionary Society will meet in Crystal Springs at the Methodist Church, April 6, 1882, at ten o'clock A. M. Each auxiliary is requested to elect a delegate and make report to the Conference Society. This meeting is very important, as it immediately precedes the meeting of the General Society in May, and the General Conference of the church. The Crystal Springs Auxiliary has kindly invited us to meet with them. Any of our pastors who can attend will be welcomed to our meeting, and can render us valuable aid. I would thank Rev. W. B. Lewis to assist the ladies in arranging for the annual meeting.

MRS. W. L. NUGENT, President.

Though I am always in haste, I am never in a hurry; because I never undertake more work than I can go through with perfect calmness of spirit.—John Wesley.

BY ALMA PRET.

He never knew the highest joy by Heaven
To erring mortals lent
The hallowed joy that follows the forgiven
Who never did repent.

The road that leads
To man's salvation is bedewed
With penitential tears;
The heart that bleeds
Her sin alone will be renewed;
And, through the endless years
Of bless'd eternity, its beauty
Will reap the highest mercies given.

"The Law as Regards Conference Claimants."

MR. EDITOR: The importance of this matter is my excuse for writing again. Bro. Moore favors changing the law so as to make the number of years in the active ministry "the basis in settling the amount paid to each claimant." In his article he presents a number of arguments to sustain his position. He will pardon me for testing their value.

His first argument is, in substance, that the money paid to "superannuates, their widows and orphans," is a claim, and not a charity. He seems to think if it is a claim it can not be a charity, and if it is a charity it can not be a claim. I have been accustomed to regard even charity as a claim, and so I am ready to admit the statement in this argument. It is undoubtedly a claim, and is so called in the Discipline. But what sort of a claim is it? There are claims of debt, of gratitude and of charity. A man labors for me at stipulated wages; he then has a claim of debt. If in laboring for me he considers my interest paramount, and makes sacrifices for me, he has a claim of gratitude. If after awhile he becomes dependent he has a claim of charity. To which claim does the Discipline refer? Bro. Moore evidently thinks to claims of debt. I would say to neither claims of debt nor merely to claims of charity, but to claims of gratitude and charity combined. According to the Discipline it can not be a claim of debt, because it says expressly, in speaking of the duty of the Board of Finance, "In no case shall they allow any preacher to have a claim on the church he has served, as of debt, after his pastoral connection has ceased." This is perfectly clear, and we are shut up to the conclusion that claims of gratitude or of charity, or of both combined, are intended. Both combined, I think, is the proper conclusion. Not only does the Discipline sustain this view, but it is reasonable. Claims of debt are met with the payment of regular salaries. And as the interest of the church has been considered paramount by the preachers, and in laboring for it they have made great personal sacrifices, a debt or claim of gratitude has been contracted. This gives them, when they or their families are placed on the list of claimants, a higher title to assistance, from the church, than belongs to mere objects of charity. If we regard the "superannuates, their widows and orphans," as having this double claim, it removes the ground upon which some withhold their money, "with the feeling that this is mere charity, and charity must begin at home." This, I think, is sufficiently clear without any further illustration.

The next argument presented is that "such a law will recognize the universal sentiment that remuneration must depend on the service rendered, and be in the ratio of the benefits received." This is a correct sentiment, and it would be well if all people would act in accordance with it. But does it apply here? Is the money paid to Conference claimants intended as remuneration for past services? It can not be if their claim is not a claim of debt, which the Discipline and, I think, reason forbids us to believe. Bro. Moore says: "Men of business are astonished when they learn that the Conference fund is divided among the claimants according to their necessities." If so it must be because they misapprehend the nature of the claim of those to whom the money is paid. I do not see why business men should be astonished at this procedure when it is the very principle upon which they act themselves. There are thousands of pensioned soldiers, widows and orphans in the United States. Business men have appropriated and divided the pension money, not as a claim of debt; for then every soldier would be entitled to a pension, but as a debt of gratitude and of charity, due to the dependent. And instead of the amount of the pension depending on the length of service all in similar circumstances receive the same sum. Mrs. Lincoln's pension was raised, a short time ago, by business men to $5,000, not because her husband was President of the United States a certain length of time, but because she had a claim of gratitude and of charity, and her circumstances were believed to demand it. Business men, who are astonished at the policy of the church, must be few in number. Besides, the Disciplinary procedure with regard to Conference claimants is in exact harmony with the financial policy of the church in every other department. It is so with the active ministry. In the language of Bro. Moore, "small salaries are paid, in general, where the expenses are not great, and large salaries where the outgo is equal to the income." Now, if the law in one case be altered, should not the whole system be made to harmonize?

In pursuing the discussion further, Bro. Moore says: "Such a law as is proposed will tend to discourage our preachers, and will not, as the present law seems to do, put a premium on prodigality." To show that the present law does put a premium on prodigality, he gives an illustration. Two preachers, A. and B., enter the Conference in the same class. A. is popular, receives large salaries, uses all his money as he gets it, and is finally put on the superannuated list. B. is economical, saves some money, and purchases a "home and farm of his own." He is also put on the superannuated list. The cases come up for consideration. The condition of A. is that of dependence. B. is not represented as in destitute circumstances. The board has $300 to divide between the two. A. gets $250 and B. $50. The division is made according to the conscientious judgment of the board concerning their necessities. Bro. Moore says the division is wrong, and then spoils his conclusion by saying: "No body asks if B. is able to work his farm, or if his land is of any account." It is forgotten that as the money saved by him was not much, his little place must be nearly or quite worthless. He was not able, after all his self-denial, to buy a good place." Hence he unintentionally admits that if B. is able to work his farm, and if his land is of any account, and if his place is of some value, then the judgment of the board was right, and B. has been properly dealt with. In such a case, who can tell whether A. has spent his large salaries in extravagance or in charity? and who can say that B. has procured his home by prudent economy or by parsimony? But is this really a supposable case? Would it not require the board to be familiar with the individual history of each man during his itinerant life? But, even admitting that the present law does tend to encourage prodigality, is that a sufficient reason to abolish it. Surely, in most Conferences the tendency to prodigality, on this account, is very slight.

Bro. Moore's last argument, in favor of the proposed change, is "that it will save our Conferences of the error or necessity of readmitting or admitting men who have spent the most and best part of their lives in secular pursuits," and who, in a very short time, become a burden to the Conference. This is very properly characterized as an "error," and it may and ought to be avoided, not by changing the law, as is proposed, but by a manly and conscientious course on the part of the Conferences. Each Conference has full authority to receive or reject applicants as its judgment dictates, and this is sufficient to enable it to avoid such an error.

Bro. Moore intimates that he has other reasons for the proposed change. Let him bring them forward, and, if they are convincing, I will keep silence, for I am not writing merely for controversy.

MIMOZON.

Help! Help!

MR. EDITOR: I am in a dilemma. Won't you help me? I can not get sufficient aid from the Discipline as it now is. We have a superior collection of rules, it is true, yet some of them are not explicit enough for some of our members. I have reference to the twelfth rule, under the first division of the "General Rules," which forbids members participating in such worldly amusements or "diversions" as can not be used in the name of the Lord Jesus;" in other words, which do not tend to the edification of believers and the glory of God. I do not think the Discipline explicit enough in defining those diversions. For there are different opinions as to what are and what are not lawful diversions. I do not contend that the Discipline should state the inoffensive diversions. But I do contend that it should express, in unqualified terms, the diversions which are most commonly practiced under the above rule, viz.: Dancing and playing cards. These are growing evils in our church, and will not cease to grow until the Discipline is more lucid in defining diversions. I am sorry that such exists in our church, and specially so that I have some offending parties in my charge. I hardly know how to proceed to administer the Discipline. I perfectly understand what requires to be done in the premises. But they (the offending parties) say that the Discipline does not forbid dancing and playing cards, as it does not state in short that members shall not dance, and shall not play cards. Now, Mr. Editor, what am I to do? How can I turn such out for dancing, etc? Ought not the Discipline to state, in unqualified terms, that these evils shall not be participated in by members of our church? I think so. I firmly believe that we, as Methodists, are rapidly losing that spiritual vitality which has ever characterized us as a church, simply on account of the nonelucidation of some terms, and the nonadministration of the Discipline in small offenses against the rules of the church. We are vigilant in keeping out and down the giant sins of immorality in the church, while the liliputian sins of diversion come in and rob us of our spiritual vitality. It is not the great sins of a man only that plunge him in eternal night, but his little sins of diversion, too, which add largely in thus engulfing him in ruin and misery eternal. So with the church. It is not the grave sins of immorality only, but small offenses, too, add much to the crushing and driving out of spiritual life and zeal. O, for that zeal! that spiritual fire that characterized early Methodism! For then would we, with the unmoriest strength of our church, with Christ as her Captain, bring into effect the now unknown possibilities in evangelizing the whole world. God speed the time.

Will you, Mr. Editor, write on this subject, and try and get the General Conference to do something to check this growing evil in our church?

Yours fraternally,

H. L. VAUGHN.

From the Work.

HOLTON, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: This little railroad town, which the rustics persist in calling "The Depot," has increased in population and business importance very much within ten years, and even very recently. About twelve thousand bales of the fleecy staple are shipped hence annually. Were it not that a large proportion of this export has no return in corn and meat the citizens all would do well financially. This is a good country for farmers. Most of our merchants do a large "supply business." They appear to get enough money back to induce them to go forward. The health record has been unusually good until the late summer of 1881, excepting the epidemic season of 1878. Even during the scorching heat and drought of this last summer no serious sickness developed among us. But autumn and winter brought a great deal of typho-malarial and simple typhoid fever. Many have suffered, and a few have died—some heart-rending cases of bereavement. But for the untiring energy and self-sacrifice of a lady member of our church much greater suffering might have ensued.

Our church building is large and comfortable; only thirty-five members are recorded on our roll. We trust a majority of these appear in the book of life. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Certainly their treatment of this pastor and his family suggests a most favorable judgment in this test. From the time of the substantially hearty reception with which they greeted our coming to the present, tokens of thoughtful Christian kindness have marked each month, if not each week, that has rolled by. What do you think of a Christmas present, from one lady (by no means rich, except in grace,) of a beautiful cow, which is now yielding a rich supply of milk and butter for a large family? Or of the parsonage being "stormed" (as it was two Saturdays ago) by many merry boys, with wheelbarrow and express wagon laden with nice things for the table, each article exactly what we wanted, as if a real clairvoyance had showed the good ladies just what the store-room lacked and our appetites craved. Estimated English style, this attack was more than four pounds—sterling. Our week-day prayer meeting is constantly attended by quite a little band of faithful members. Indeed, it is noteworthy how well the attendance on this service has been sustained. Favored by weather, there has been scarcely a Thursday evening for twelve months on which we have failed to meet with a fair number, called together by this pulse-throb of Christianity. We have an excellent Sunday-school. It may not rival Bro. Black's, of Natchez, but, compared with our church membership, it can hold up its head. By the activity and faithfulness of its superintendents, the promptness and diligence of its teachers (all of whom are members of our church) and, above all, by the blessing of God, the average attendance, even in winter, is larger than the number of church members. Money enough is raised regularly to supply our own literature abundantly, with the blackboard exercise, besides helping considerably with the incidental expenses of the church. We have a Juvenile Missionary Society, which proposes to educate a Chinese girl. Our Woman's Missionary Society is doing a good work.

Rejoice with us that the little parsonage debt has been reduced, within a year, from $150 to $20. We hope soon to raise this remaining incubus.

As is too common, some of our members are cold and inattentive, and all of us need the baptism of fire. Will not brethren all help us to pray for its speedy, abundant outpouring?

Yours hopefully, J. P. DRAKE.

OPELOUSAS DISTRICT.

MR. EDITOR: In accordance with the notice published in the ADVOCATE, the quarterly meeting for Washington circuit was to be held at Washington, January 21-22, and, by the blessing of the Lord, I reached there in due time, and I was kindly received at the parsonage by Bro. Manley, the preacher in charge, and his kind family. I was sorry to find Bro. Manley in feeble health, not having entirely recovered from a spell of sickness with which he had been attacked on his return home from the session of the Annual Conference. I found him much concerned for his work, and that our quarterly meeting should be pleasant and successful; but the state of the weather seemed to cast a gloom over his hopes, which were not brightened from the fact that it was then raining, the roads bad, and but few, even the members of the church, knew of the appointment; and, though gentle and patient, it was difficult for him to conceal his desire for the quarterly meeting to be changed to a more auspicious time. I therefore postponed it until April 15-16, and, taking the cars early next morning, I returned to Morgan City, arriving at Berwick, on the west side of the bay, and about one mile from the hospitable mansion of Capt. J. N. Pharr, which I soon reached after a pleasant walk along the margin of the bay. Bro. Pharr was not in at the moment, but I was met by his wife, that elect lady and indefatigable Christian worker, Sister Pharr, who gave me a warm reception, and I esteem it a privilege to enjoy the prayers, association and hallowed influences of a Christian family thus fully consecrated, filled with the Spirit, and ready for every good word and work for the Master. I caught afresh the sacred flame, and a new impetus and encouragement in the glorious work.

At Morgan City they have an excellent Sunday-school, of which Sister Pharr is the superintendent. I think it never retires into summer or winter quarters; it is well furnished with the quarterly and lesson papers, and other Sunday-school literature from our Publishing House at Nashville; they have an excellent plan of each member, officers, teachers and scholars reciting a verse of Scripture at roll-call.

Through this Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, established at Morgan City, of which Sister Pharr is president, the poor children are looked after, and fed and clothed and sent to school. They are now sending about ten children to day-school, and furnishing in some instances employment for others. They are also trying to put the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE into every family that will read it, thereby displacing other papers of questionable literature.

Sunday-school and church services over, the family, recrossing the bay, returned home, and, after partaking of dinner prepared on Saturday, they all joined in the Bible class, together with the neighbors, who came in to enjoy with them the privilege of studying the sacred Scriptures, with Bro. Pharr as their instructor. The lay presented no formidable obstruction to prevent any from attending church again at night. How blessed thus to spend the holy Sabbath.

MORGAN CITY, LA., Jan. 23, 1882.

CHINA GROVE CIRCUIT, SEASHORE DISTRICT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Notwithstanding my feeble health all last year, and being unable most of the time to attend to my ministerial duties properly, and to serve the work as it should be done, I was returned to this work again this year, which is agreeable, I think, to the wishes of all. We have some noble, kind, liberal, Christian-hearted people on China Grove circuit, who have been suffering in their efforts to support us in our affliction, and I trust they will reap a rich reward for the loving Christian spirit they have manifested toward me in my feeble condition. Three members of my charge, all members of the same church—Pine Grove—passed from earth to their rich reward last September. Their obituaries have been unintentionally neglected, and I feel that I must say something in regard to their Christian lives and triumphant deaths. Bro. Samuel Stewart was an exhorter, and a useful member of our church—delighted in doing God's service. He passed away in the triumphs of a living faith, September —, 1881. Sister Lucy Lampton, wife of Walter Lampton, was a lovely Christian woman. She was a true, faithful and devoted wife, and conspicuous among many delightful qualities was her devotion to her children, three sweet little boys. She died peacefully September —, 1881. May God comfort the bereaved husband, and may he be prepared to meet her where "parting is unknown."

Bro. Jabez Yarborough was a quiet, unassuming, Christian-hearted man. He knew his duty to his pastor and the church, and discharged that duty promptly and faithfully. He leaves a noble, sweet-spirited wife to mourn his loss, but she does not mourn "as those who have no hope." He also leaves three children, all grown, and we trust they will try to imitate his virtues, and be enabled to meet him "beyond the sunset's radiant glow." He was sick several weeks with typhoid fever, and died September —, 1881.

Our first quarterly meeting for the present year is past. Bro. T. S. West, our much-beloved presiding elder, was with us, and did some of his good preaching. The financial reports for the first quarter were tolerably good. The spiritual condition of the church is not what it should be. Social meetings and family worship are too much neglected with some of the members. I trust they will bestir themselves, and assist me, as their pastor, in building up the walls of Zion. I hope my health may yet be restored, and that I may be permitted to assist in promoting the cause of God. Nevertheless, "not my will, but thine, O God, be done."

FANNIN, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Our first Quarterly Conference for Fannin circuit was held at Holly Bush, February 11-12. J. M. Gann, P. E., was at his post, doing very efficient work. We had a very good attendance of official members, and good congregations both days, and a fine impression made. I think our circuit is in a prosperous condition. I have been traveling part of this work for four years, up to this fall, and will have to move next year. We have a very pleasant home at Fannin, in the midst of a kind, hospitable people. So it is with regret we anticipate moving, but the Lord knows best, and we are submissive. We have received a great many into the church on this work for the last three years. I think we will have to use the pruning knife pretty freely this year, and, though it will be somewhat painful, yet we think it necessary for the prosperity of the church. We have had a great deal of rain, and our farmers are generally behind, but are having some fine days now. Finances are rather behind; hope all will come up well at the end. Wishing the ADVOCATE great success, we are as ever yours.

FANNIN, Feb. 22, 1882.

HINESTON, LOUISIANA.

MR. EDITOR: We are glad to be able to say that Methodism in these parts is still in its usual working condition. Our first Quarterly Conference has just been held. Our pastor is at his post, and is full of zeal for the salvation of souls. We feel sure that, with the aid of three energetic local preachers, and backed up by the prayers of a large membership, success will crown our efforts. Prayer meetings and Sunday-schools will receive their usual attention as soon as the weather becomes suitable. Farming operations are somewhat behind, owing to so much rain, but the farmers are on the alert, and make every fair day count to advantage. The health of the country, with a few exceptions, is very good.

CYNUS.

HINESTON, LA., Feb. 25, 1882.

SPRINGVILLE CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Conference year is rolling away much after the usual way; the preachers are at their posts, and hopeful. For years we have been hearing the people talk of hard times, but never with such emphasis as now; but to those who are in harmony with God the promises fully sustain. The blood is upon us. At Coushatta we have a few feet of bank, but above and below but little land is out. Owing to the continued rains, farmers have not been able to do much toward planting their crops. The small-pox is also among us. One of my stewards, Bro. Porter, has a case in his family, but so far there has been no other case reported.

Our school in Coushatta, under the management of Prof. L. L. Upton and wife, assisted by Mrs. Brown, is rapidly building up, and, as a school of high grade, thorough instruction and fine discipline, well deserves the patronage of the people. Bro. McClendon's health has fully broken down, and we greatly fear he will not be able to attend to the duties of the district this year.

Obituaries.

TAIT.—Mrs. ADELE A. TAIT, wife of James G. Tait, and daughter of Mrs. C. O. and the late Samuel T. Baines, died October 22, 1881, aged forty-one years, two months and three days.

"She is not dead but sleepeth." Yes, sleeping quietly the serene and undisturbed sleep that calms it best to the weary. Sleeping, yea, in peace, for the battle with the world is over, the victory won, the tired spirit seeks and finds peace in the fold of the Lord who gave it. Life to this lovable, beautiful woman was not entirely devoid of cares. From early girlhood death had set his seal on her brow, the leaden finger upon her cheek speaking too painfully the tale that is now in sorrow told. But amidst the afflictions to her household, caused by the death of her little children, she was ever "soothed and sobered by an unfaltering faith," which bade her "look to the cross and live." To her venerable mother and only surviving sister who have to labor and so many sad afflictions to "sweep their heartstrings o'er," we would say: "Weep not for the dead who die in the Lord." She is not dead, but gone, too pure for earth; the Saviour hath called her to join her children "on the other shore." In offering a brother's condolence to her grief-stricken husband, we would cite him to her life of fervent Christian zeal, her patient suffering during a chronic and painful disease, her meek submission to the Master's will, praying the while that "He will temper the winds to the shorn lamb;" that the faith which was hers in life may inspire his soul with hope, and shine afar a beacon-light that shall lead him to join her at last in "that land that is fairer than this." To her dear little children we would hold up every act in their mother's life as worthy to be copied by them. The blessed promises of Scripture are always fulfilled to the faithful, and her little ones will never be turned out upon a cold, uncharitable world; for your mother, my darlings, took every orphan to her heart and home, and, in the magnanimity of her great, good soul, said, "Rest here." In this she cast her bread upon the waters, and it will return again after many days to the children.

Gently may the green sod cover the grave of this departed, angelic sister. May the flowers of spring blossom in unwonted splendor, and forest choristers daily in most tuneful melodies sing the requiem o'er the last home of our cherished dead. While our hearts are clothed in sorrow, the eye of faith catches the bright rays of hope telling us again: Peace, be still; "she is not dead but sleepeth."

MARTIN—J. E. MARTIN, son of John F. and Aquilla Martin, was born in Barbour County, Ala., July 27, 1855; professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at seventeen years of age; was married to Frances McLeod, of Dale County, Ala., December 31, 1876; died at his father's in Geneva, County, Ala., January 19, 1882.

Brother Martin was a good and true man. He was ever ready to help forward the interest of the church to his fullest ability. In fact, he was always ready when called upon to do his duty in any and all departments of the church he loved so well. There was but one thing that seemed to trouble him when on his death bed; the thought that he had neglected family prayer. This seemed to press with great weight upon his mind a few days before he died. He fell blessed be God a few hours before he breathed his last, he told his wife that, that God, for Christ's sake had forgiven him all his sins. The disciples of all our Christian duties, as followers of the Meek and lowly Lamb, make it easy to die. The heroism of this one duty caused my brother a great deal of trouble while on his death bed. But the goodness of God, O how great to forgiving all our sins, if we but come to him, even in a dying hour. Just before his death Brother Martin called his wife to him and asked her to meet him in heaven. Brother Martin was beloved, was social and sociable; in his enjoyment he was hilarious, self-reliant and possessed strictest integrity; as a husband and father he was the studies clustering around those relations, with earnestness most admirable. The church and family have met a great loss in his death. He leaves a wife, and two little babes, and a host of friends and relations to mourn their loss. But as we mourn with the bereaved family and friends, sorrow not as those who have no hope, for we confidently expect to meet him in the bright beyond. We hope his family and friends will become reconciled to his death, for God knew best, and called him home. May our God who has promised grace in each trial heal this wound and bring them all at last to their own beautiful heaven above.

IRELAND.—Mrs. MARTHA IRELAND, wife of Rev. Stephen Ireland, to whom she was married January 31, 1843, was born in Calvert Co., Maryland, April 1824 and died near Natchez, Miss., February 5, 1882. The date of birth and of death, the beginning of life and its ending here, but between these two points a thousand experiences; much of joy and of sorrow, many thrilling hopes and trembling fears; hours of defeat and of victory; above all a time to prepare to meet God and to enjoy him forever. This last thought came early into the mind of Sister Ireland, and became the ruling power, bringing under subjection thought, feelings, and actions; for at the age of fourteen she became a member of the church and gave her heart to Christ.

She loved her own church and strove to obey its teachings, feeling sure that if she became a true Methodist, she would win her Saviour's approval, and be welcomed by him to his Father's mansions.

Her religion was not so much in word as in life. It shone in her care for the comfort of others. It cleared itself in a beautiful silence relative to the faults of others, and was seen in her self-sacrificing life as wife in the social sense; her husband was everything to her, she trusted in him and sought every effort of his to better his fortune. She was fond a mother as she was a wife; patient, gentle, loving, her children never found it by all that the word "mother" speaks. True of her are the wise man's words, "Her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

What a rich treasure the memory of such a Christian wife and mother! Though the heart mourns because death has taken away the one it cherished as the object of devotion, yet is there comfort in the heritage the life of the loved leaves us. The pure purpose, the patience, the acts of kindness, the earnest charity, the humble faith that adorned her, the remembrance of her triumphant end, all these are comfort and hope, for they who, as these, "shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." Sister Ireland died resting in Him who had washed through the gates of death. She and all Christians have found that he has left those gates open for entrance into the kingdom of God.

J. L. BURNS.

THOMPSON.—Col. JAMES M. THOMPSON died at his residence in Opelousas, La., January 22, 1882, aged sixty-four years. He was born in one of the Western States and removed to this place in early life. He distinguished himself when a young man in the battle of San Jacinto, was a lieutenant in the second Louisiana Confederate Cavalry, held a number of civil offices of trust and honor after the late war. He was for many years a leading physician. He was married to Miss Begnaud, one of the finest Creole families of the country, who died several years ago. He leaves three sons and two daughters, all of whom are highly esteemed citizens. Bro. Thompson joined the Methodist Church South about six years ago. I have found him during my pastorate to be a devoted and useful member. I was with him often during his last illness. His faith was strong and anticipations of heaven bright. The last words he spoke in relation to his spiritual condition was just a few hours before his death, and were, "Bro. Hough, I am ready to die and don't want to live any longer. I don't wish to get well." He then requested prayers for us. I sang his favorite hymn, "Lover of My Soul," and the chorus of "I am Going to the Land of Canaan, Glory, Hallelujah!" The children kneeled by the bedside while we prayed and the old patriarch sang "Amen." We all seemed to be lifted up to God during that prayer. It was a sacred season. His youngest son, a fine, manly looking young man, joined our church the following Sabbath. God grant that we may go to Heaven and be ever engaged in the service of our God, that the children and parents may meet in Heaven.

THOMAS J. H.

BLOCK.—Our friend Mr. HENRY BLOCK is no more, has gone to be with the dead. He was born in Richmond, Va., September 9, 1820. When a boy his father settled in Washington, Ark. Some years before the war, a student in the Nashville University, Nashville, Tenn. While a student he joined the Methodist Church and was thereby imbued with its spiritual creed.

At the age of eighteen he began his mercantile career in Arkansas. In his thirtieth year he was married to the daughter of our late beloved and honored brother, Rev. H. C. Thweatt. Thirty-two years were passed away in the pleasant relations of wedded life. This union was blessed with five boys and two daughters, all of whom passed to the spirit world, save one daughter, Mrs. Emma Topham, who with her mother, in their deep bereavement, Mr. Block was a leading member of several large mercantile houses in this city, the last being Block & Britton. Several years of hardness preyed upon his health, but, as has been his custom, he attended the house of God, seemed increasingly prayerful and concerned for the things of God. In November last he was stricken with apoplexy, from which he never rallied. I visited him nothing before his death. He was much engaged in prayer. He breathed his last February 16, 1882, in his 62d year. He was a public-hearted, kind man, a faithful husband and affectionate father. We trust he has found a rest and a place in the blessed home of the good.

J. B. WALKER.

BUTLER.—Mrs. JANE C. BUTLER, wife of Rev. C. C. Butler, and daughter of H. W. and H. P. Hill, was born in Rapides parish, La., October 5, 1840; united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at the age of sixteen, and was happily converted during the fall of 1857 at the home of her mother-in-law (H. S. Smith), while praying with a friend, desiring her to be religious. Was married happily October 6, 1870; died in the Christian faith, in Monroe, February 6, 1882. Thus Sister Butler has followed her little babe (Chissie) to the home of the blessed in a few short months. Sister Butler was a woman of sterling Christian worth, and bore her afflictions with patient fortitude and resignation. She was the mother of six children, five of whom are left behind with the world without a mother's care. She leaves behind four sisters and many dear friends to mourn her death. We are not anxious about her future. She lived right, and it is well with the righteous. I love to make this record. It is so much better than to hang our hopes on shreds of experience gathered in a dying hour. We deeply mourn the loss to the militant part of God's kingdom, but feel assured that she has quit the battle to enjoy the victory. May he, who tempers the winds to the shorn lamb, sanctify the wants of the motherless ones for the great work of training them for heaven.

HER PASTOR.

HOLMES.—ASSIE GASTON HOLMES, daughter of M. T. and Susanna Holmes, was born June 29, 1880, and died September 20, 1881. "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," said the blessed Saviour when on earth, and when he went to heaven it was to prepare a home for these little ones.

By the Father's throne he stands and receives them one by one into the realms of Beulah. Safe and from all the cold winds of adversity, redeemed from all the blighting effects of sin. It is alone through the God given grace in our hearts that we can bow our heads under the rod and say: "All is well!"

HEAVEN AT HAND.

Heaven is here, where hymns of gladness
Cheer the lonely, rugged way;
In this world, where clouds of sadness
Often change our night to day.
Heaven is here, where misery lightened
Of its heavy load is seen;
Where the face of sorrow brightened,
By the deed of love doth beam:
Where the bound, the poor, deserting,
Are set free, supplied, and blest
Where in others' labors sharing
We can find our surest rest;
Where we hold the voice of duty
Larger than man's wrath or red,
This is heaven—its peace, its beauty
Radiant with the smile of God.

Judge Edward McGehee.

BY J. H. MUSE, ESQ.

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

An humble tribute to the memory of Judge McGehee, late of Wilkinson county, Miss.

The following simple propositions may be stated, as fully illustrated in the life and character of the subject of this brief memoir, viz: 1. Human life ever acquires its greatest value in the present state of being when regulated according to the teaching of God's holy blessed book. 2. Human character ever reaches its highest development when formed and shaped upon the models of Moses and the prophets, of Christ and his apostles. 3. The sum of human happiness is ever incomparably the greatest when sought in the never-failing sources of happiness, contentment and peace which are opened up in the gospel of the grace of God to every soul of man.

The writer first became acquainted with Judge McGehee in 1839-40, being at that time a member of the Legislature of Louisiana he was called, from his seat, early one morning to the lobby, and introduced to him; he promptly explained to the writer the object of the interview. There was then pending before the Legislature a bill for the relief of the Woodville and West Feliciana Railroad Company, in which he was one of the stockholders, on which he desired the favorable consideration of the writer. Never has that interview faded in the least degree from the memory of the writer. Never has he been so favorably and deeply impressed on first acquaintance with any man as he was with Judge McGehee. In his conversation, his demeanor and general bearing, there was the simplicity and guilelessness of a child, the seriousness of a man combined with the dignity of a ruler. Such was his character. He was then in the prime and vigor of manhood's age for him, having died in his sixty-fourth year; probably between seventy and sixty; of tall commanding person, formed in Nature's finest mold. Of course he obtained what he desired at the hands of the Legislature. It was a short time after this first acquaintance that the writer became professionally acquainted with Judge McGehee, together with General Taylor (afterwards President), had signed their names as sureties to a tutor's bond who died without having filed an account of his tutorship. The sureties had to respond, but there was no appeal to the courts to delay, evade or avoid their liabilities; but to competent accountants to ascertain the amount of their liabilities. This being done, there was no end to the matter, and their liabilities were promptly met. No man placed a higher estimate upon good faith in contracts than Judge McGehee; he likewise regarded most scrupulously the moral obligation which often survives the legal tie.

Judge McGehee as a Litigant in Court.—A few years after the railroad above alluded to had been partly constructed, a rupture occurred under the lead of Isaac McCord, between the railroad contractors and the railroad company, then having a bank located at Woodville, Miss. A very considerable amount of work had been done upon the railroad; the contractors had also dealt very liberally with the bank. They finally abandoned their contract for alleged violations on the part of the railroad company, laying their claims for damages, loss of profits and arrearages of payments for work done, at $300,000. The issues made up between the parties required a thorough investigation of the work done, the time consumed, the timber used, the grades, the embankments, and the account of the contractors with the bank. The case was some years in court before it was tried. A special term of the district court for the parish of West Feliciana was convened to try it. Hon. Thomas Butler (a most eminent and worthy citizen), then supernumerary judge, presided. On March 3, 1845, the case was called for trial, and the following jury empanelled: Lewis Sterling, Tidence Neville, Samuel Gray, John Henshaw, John D. Baker, John Pugh, David Barrow, N. B. Riddle, James Redman, L. P. McCauly, Lewis E. Turner, W. H. Barrow. The verdict was rendered on July 3, 1845. Among the jurors, those who knew the citizens of West Feliciana in her palmiest days, will recognize a number of the most intelligent and excellent of whom she could ever boast. On the trial, the railroad and banking company were represented by Maj. Joseph Johnson and Judge McGehee, two of the principal stockholders. The attorneys who represented the plaintiffs, the railroad contractors, were Hon. T. G. Morgan, Hon. W. T. Boyle and Cyrus Ratliff, afterwards district judge. On the part of the defendants, the railroad and banking company, were Hon. Ex-Chief Justice Merrick, Ed. Z. S. Lyons (a very able lawyer), and the writer. With the issues before the court, the jury and the community (for an intense interest was manifested in the country in the trial and its result), it is perhaps needless to say that every inch of ground was contested, every item of evidence scrutinized, and every legal question that arose was discussed to exhaustion. The testimony taken down formed a record of some thousand pages (if the memory of the writer be not at fault.) During this fearful ordeal, extending through about four months, the representatives of the defendants, Maj. Johnson and Judge McGehee were at their posts with very few days excepted. So far as Judge McGehee was concerned, his power of endurance, his physical and mental patience, his fortitude, self-possession, and power of self-government seemed to be superhuman. His perfect equanimity never forsook him, though at times he manifested the deepest sensibility. In the argument of the case, there was a division of labor agreed upon between the writer and his associate attorneys. To Col. Lyons (according to our recollection) was assigned the task of investigating the evidence bearing upon certain points or stipulations in the contract between the parties, on which breaches had been charged against the defendants. To Judge Merrick was assigned the discussion of the principal legal questions involved in the case and citing the authorities. To the writer, the vindication of our clients against charges of fraud and bad faith. A brief sojourn at Woodville, in the regular gospel ministry (alas! alas! that it was so brief), had afforded the writer ample opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with Judge McGehee (thanks be to God for this) prior to his employment in this important law suit. In a long practice of his legal profession, the writer has often felt himself robbed, despoiled of his property, maligned and defamed, in the persons of his clients. But never, nor since the trial of that case, has he found his being, personal and professional, so merged in the person, the interest, the unsullied integrity, the good name and spotless reputation of a client, as on that occasion. The argument of the case being closed, the jury received the charge of the court, retired to their room and returned a verdict reducing the plaintiffs' demand from $350,000 to six and one-fourth cents. Affirmed by Superior Court. Third annual reports, 285. J. Metford & Company vs. West Feliciana Railroad Company. An incident occurred connected with this protracted trial, not unworthy of notice. When the jury were being empanelled, old "Uncle Billy Thow" (F. M. T.) was planting a crop of corn in a vacant lot in front of the courthouse. While the plaintiffs' attorneys were delivering their closing arguments, "Uncle Billy" was gathering his crop of boldly.

Judge McGehee at Home.—In his princely mansion at Bowling Green good home-life and domestic bliss reigned supreme. Being blessed as he was, with a spouse who was truly a helpmeet for him, a model Christian lady of the highest order of intellect, of intellectual and social culture; a model governess of a household, an honored mother of a family, "whose children rise up and call her blessed." At the home and in the heart of Judge McGehee the law of kindness was the law of life in all its relations. The language of truth, candor, sincerity and brotherly love dwelt upon his tongue, while charity, heaven-born charity, kept the door of his lips. But, while abounding in wealth, possessing all that heart could wish for personal or family comfort or enjoyment, his princely home was not a secluded spot or place from the off-side or surrounding world. No! no! no! The stranger did not lodge in the streets, but he opened his door to the traveler; the homeless found a home there; the friendless found a friend there; the poor, the needy, the afflicted, whose necessities drove them to his door, were never turned away empty. The weary traveler, laboring to spread Scripture holiness throughout the land, having no certain dwelling-place, for the humblest of whom he cherished the most affectionate and benevolent regard, found place of rest and kindest hospitality beneath his roof.

Reflections upon the Character of Judge McGehee.—As the law of kindness reigned and ruled in his heart at home and abroad, he was the politest man and the most agreeable and instructive social companion with whom the writer ever had the honor and delight of being acquainted. He was not an educated man in the scholastic sense of the term; but he was thoroughly indoctrinated in the true philosophy of life by those lessons of inspired wisdom contained in the Bible. He was a faithful pupil in the school of the great Master who hath said: "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls." His smooth-worn, carefully-handled New Testament precious treasure! through which life and immortality have been brought to light, was his study especially on the Sabbath. For him, as well as for all of like precious faith, the following lines may well be regarded as written by the evangelic poet:

"Thy word is everlasting truth;
How pure is every page!
That holy book shall guide our youth,
And well support our age."

He was not ambitious; he sought not the honors that come from men, but those only which come from God. It was said of him truthfully by Bishop Keener in his admirable address that he handled money without loving it, that he accumulated wealth without desiring it. This apparent paradox resulted from a most legitimate source. Industry and economy were in the estimation of Judge McGehee cardinal virtues and excellencies of character. These he cultivated and inculcated in his household, and practiced and enforced them by his example, and being a great master of business, as he was in almost every branch and department of productive labor and enterprise in the country, the necessary result was the rapid accumulation of wealth and the handling of money. But he was a man who had seen affliction; passing often during his long and useful life through the deep and dark waters of affliction and sorrow; three companions of his bosom and a number of his beloved children having preceded him to the grave; but of him it might be said, as often said and sung in one of the best of evangelical hymns:

"When through the deep waters I cause thee to go,
The rivers of woe shall not thee overflow,
For I will be with thee thy troubles to bless,
And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress."

To these afflictions he bowed in humble submission to the Divine will, never murmuring nor distrusting the Divine goodness. His peace of mind and support in the midst of those trying scenes of life as all know, who know him intimately, rested upon a foundation beyond the vicissitudes of time. Thus is it written: "Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on God, because he trusteth in him. Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him. I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him. I will be with him in trouble, I will deliver him and honor him. With long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation." It is also written: "The Lord taketh pleasure in his people. He will beautify the meek with salvation."

In conclusion let us pause, for a few moments, to reflect upon the character of a man who faithfully served his day and generation, who lived to secure a place in the holy society of "the spirits of just men made perfect." In contemplating his character it may justly be regarded as presenting the similitude of a well-constructed and well-fortified citadel, with lines carefully and sharply drawn around it, separating between good and evil; nothing contraband, or having "the appearance of evil," being permitted to have ingress or egress through those lines. As a moral and religious structure, harmonious and heavenly in all its parts, "beautified" by the Divine Architect. Commanding our admiration! our reverence! our love!

They who contemplate it aright, must think but lightly of his earthly possessions while living, as those of the present and future generations when lingering around the sacred spot where sleep the remains of the honored dead, glanced at the shadow cast upon the ground by the monumental marble, which, rising far above the earth, points to heaven, bearing upon its face the honored and imperishable name of EDWARD M'GEHEE.

Religious Intelligence.

MISSIONARY.

Some dreadful stories come from Alaska of the cruelties practiced by the superstitious heathen. One of the most profound of their beliefs is that evil spirits take possession of persons, especially old women, who are punished with great cruelty as witches. A letter from Miss Dunbar, a Presbyterian missionary at Fort Wrangell, communicates to the Women's Board of Missions at St. Louis accounts of some horrible occurrences recently at which several families were involved. Those condemned were of all ages from four years to seventy. A family at Lock, where heathenism is strongest, were sentenced to do the following spiritual jugglers, in league with Satan. The grandmother was tied to a tree and tortured and starved to death. When she cried with thirst, the torturers gave her salt-water to drink. The grandfather and two children escaped, and wandered until almost starved in a lonely forest, finally escaping and making their way to Fort Wrangell, in a most pitiful condition. A little girl five years old was accused of giving "bad medicine" to her aunt, who had been taken sick, and she was locked up three days, without food or drink, and whipped during cruelly. The military authorities rescued her from death. When an epidemic breaks out, all the defenseless women and children who do not escape to the woods are sacrificed. Much excellent missionary work is being done among these people, who appear anxious to be taught.—New York Independent.

The feeling of the Bombay public on the subject of widow re-marriage is becoming more pronounced. The Indian Spectator thus portrays and incident which occurred in a train car: "To have an idea of the strong feeling against the prohibition of widow re-marriage you have only to broach the subject in one of the tram cars at work. The other day I heard it mentioned by a seedy and Brahmin who had tried to defend lifelong widowhood. He was all but torn up. His customer gave him the worst half-hour the wretch ever had in his life. He was scoffed, taunted, abused, hissed and at last driven out of the car. He jumped on a disgraced man for life, cursing his whole breed."—Lucknow Witness.

The Baptist cause is progressing in Europe. In Germany, at Barmen, there have been sixty conversions; at Hellfronn, a great revival; at Gundelfingen, a good work among the Jews; at Freiburg, thirteen baptisms; at Posth, seventy-one baptisms on a recent preaching tour in Hungary. In Sweden, Baptist Churches have recently been established at Hoegsjo, at Aneby, at Bodafors, at Gaesta, at Petala, and at Vasa. Numerous accessions are reported from all parts of the field.

—The C. M. S. of London has established a new mission at Uyui—a collection of villages under the control of a governor appointed by the Sultan of Zanzibar. It is described as a very large town for Africa. Mr. Copplestone, one of the early missionaries for Mtesa's kingdom, took up his abode at Uyui in 1879, and, in June, 1880, was joined by Mr. Litchfield, who came south from Uganda for the benefit of his health. Mr. Copplestone, who has learned the Unyamuozi language, has built a school-room, where he teaches the natives. He is assisted by one of the Free Town African Christians.

—The Rev. E. W. Hitchcock, D. D., in his recent visit to this country, succeeded, without much effort, in securing ten thousand dollars for the proposed improvements of the American Chapel in Paris. Brief as his visit was nevertheless it gratified himself and his friends. He returned by the Brittanic, and will be at home again in time to meet the throngs of his fellow-countrymen who are wont to resort to Paris in the summer season.

—In Madura, South India, at a public meeting, the natives were exhorted by the missionaries to become Christians, and were told that in Europe and America most of the people were professedly Christians, followers of Christ. Upon which one of them exclaimed, "What! and suffered us for so many ages to go to hell without even coming to tell us about it? What kind of religion is that?"

—Protestantism appears to be making quite good progress in Syria. According to a recent letter there are over 11,000 children in evangelical schools, of whom nearly one half are girls. This does not include Palestine. In the city of Beirut, alone, there are 9,000 in the schools of all kinds, 3,000 of whom are under Protestant instruction.

—Sheldon Jackson, D. D., of the Presbyterian Church, has completed his third missionary tour in Alaska, in which he has established two new missions and stationed three missionaries, made many improvements in buildings, and traveled five hundred miles in a canoe with wild Indians.

—Rev. Maxwell Phillips, who during the past nine years has been engaged in mission work in Mexico, under the Foreign Mission Board, has accepted a commission from the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and has been assigned to duty in New Mexico.

—The Southern Baptist Home Mission Board has engaged to care for, feed, clothe, and educate 50 boys and 50 girls at the Levering Manual Labor School, Indian Territory, and the Creek Nation has engaged to help the board with $7,000 a year.

—The Rev. J. F. Thomson, a missionary in Buenos Ayres, has gathered a Sunday-school of 280 children, and preaches six times each week. The prospects of the mission seem encouraging. Missions in South America are neither very numerous nor very successful.

—It is a fact of much moment and interest that, while the Koran is not being rapidly multiplied, nor widely circulated by an active organization, the Bible is translated into both the Arabic and the Turkish languages, and is being sent into all those countries where these languages are either spoken or read.

—The Lord Mayor of London has given a dinner to Dr. Moffatt, the venerable African missionary. Several members of the C. M. S. Committee and the Secretaries were present. Canon Hore delivered an address on behalf of the missionary societies represented.

—Rev. Wm. Arthur says of the work in Paris: "I have addressed more people in evangelistic services during the last four years than ever I saw collected together in religious services during all the previous years I have known Paris."

—Rev. Thomas Bridges, missionary to the islands of Terra del Fuego, now lives in an iron house, sent him by friends in England, so violent are the tempests in that far-off land. The only quadruped on the islands is the dog.

—Steps are being taken to open an institution for the theological training of native missionaries in India, to be supported by the whole of the Presbyterian Churches represented in that field.

—The New York City Mission held in September 360 gospel meetings, with a total attendance of 45,000 persons, distributed 70,000 tracts, etc., obtained 135 temperance pledges and aided 301 families.

—There is a great quickening in religious matters in India. All sects are affected by it, and Brahmans, Hindus and Mohammedans are watching for great and important events.

—About 120 children are attending the schools of the Free Church of Scotland mission on the shores of Lake Nyanza in Central Africa.

—The American Board has just sent out quite a large force of missionaries, both old and young. One, Dr. Nichols, goes as a physician to Bihe, Central Africa, and several go to China.

The American Free Baptist mission in Southern Bengal occupies six principal stations, has 515 members, and 1,100 Sunday-school scholars.

—A wealthy German Baptist has bought an old convent on the island of Capri, Italy, and a small Baptist Church has been organized there.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The Salvation Army appears to be making great headway in England. The religious censuses which have been taken in so many towns and cities give some idea of the strength of the Army. It would appear that its meetings are better attended than those of the various churches. At Gateshead on a single Sunday the aggregate attendance was 11,655; in Hull, 11,301; in Sheffield, 4,000; in Nottingham, 4,215; in Bradford, 4,200; in Scarborough, 3,380; in Portsmouth, 3,000. A correspondent of the Nonconformist points out among the defects of the Army this:

"There is no provision for improvement and development in manner and matter as men's minds enlarge and their feelings change. The preaching of the captains, both in style and sense, is the same now as it was in the beginning. Those who heard their first addresses hear nothing different and nothing better now. They do not edify, they merely assist. They turn men round, but they do not move them on, and this shows both the power and the weakness, the success and the failure, the unsolidness and the imperfection of their organization. The Salvation Army, from the very nature of its operations, from the very nature of its purpose, can only convert men. It succeeds in doing this; but, unless those converted are moved on into a higher school, in which they may be built up and established, mere conversion will in time make little or no practical moral improvement in them. Unless they move on to something better, they will turn back to something worse. It is impossible for them to remain long without moving one way or the other; and it is because no means are provided to move them forward that the thousands who profess conversion from the evangelistic services of Moody and Sankey and others and from the services of the Salvation Army relapse into sin and vanish again into the darkness of godlessness."

—The "Living Church" corrects a statement that the increase in the Episcopal Church in Chicago has been but one church in ten years, and says in 1871 there were 2,165 communicants reported to the convention; in 1881 the number was 3,871, an increase of 78 per cent. But this does not represent the whole growth. In 1871 there were but six suburban churches, and in 1881 there were fifteen. The real statistics of the communicant growth are: that in 1871 there were 2,483 communicants, and in 1881, 4,722, an increase of 2,239, or 90 per cent.

—The Bishop of Winchester recently deplored the fact that the Church of England does not reach the working classes of great towns. Another Bishop, Dr. Durnford of Chichester, holds a different opinion, and asserts that the establishment does reach those classes, and, in proof, states that numbers of them recently attended the laying of the foundation stone of a new church.

—A cable dispatch of February 15, from Rome, says:

"The Pope has addressed a very grave letter to the Indian Bishops, commanding them, in view of the dangers surrounding the church, to increase their activity, to encourage Catholic Societies among the laity, to develop the Catholic press, and to advocate boldly the temporal independence of the Pope."

—Dr. Pope has prepared a revised catechism which the Wesleyan Book-Room will publish soon in great numbers. It was proposed at the Conference in London that an effort be made to place this work in all the branches of Methodism.

—In the negotiations between Russia and the Vatican, the former requires as the price of peace and liberty for the Church of Rome in Poland that it shall not pretend to be called national and that the Pontiff shall use religious sentiment to foster Slavism.

—St. Louis is to have a new Theological Seminary, which is to be organized by the German Evangelical Church. The building will cost $30,000, and will probably be situated on Rosedale Heights.

—The Tokio Young Men's Christian Association, consisting wholly of natives, have concluded to start a religious magazine.—Baptist Missionary Magazine.

—Paris has now 92 Sunday-schools with 7,100 scholars, who are taught by 819 teachers. This shows a gain of 5 schools for the year 1881.

—The Lutherans in this country built 141 churches last year and 505 in the last four years. The greatest activity was in the Synodical Conference.

—The 874 Baptist Churches of New York report for 1881 only 3,533 baptisms. Four hundred and forty-four churches, or more than half, report no baptisms.

—Mr. Gladstone has agreed to hear Scotch deputations in favor of disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, if legislation for this purpose should be brought forward in Parliament.

Our Young People.

WHAT WE SHOULD DO WHEN OTHERS PRAY.

If before an earthly king
We were called to stand,
Humbly would we bow the head,
Humbly fold the hand.

Had we done some sinful thing,
And defied his laws,
Ghastly would we welcome one
Who would plead our cause.

Should we look about and laugh,
He would think that we Did not care if all our crimes
Should forgiven be.

Thus when to the King of heaven
One shall kneel in prayer,
Humbly let our listening hearts
The petition share.

Foreheads bowed and hands at rest,
Should our posture be,
While from straying thoughts and pleas
Heart and mind are free.

Pearl Gatherers.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: Papa takes the ADVOCATE, and as I never see anything from this part of Louisiana, I have concluded to write a little letter which I hope you will not throw in the "waste basket," as it is my first attempt to write a letter for the paper. I am a little girl seven years old. I go to school to mamma and am studying grammar, geography, fourth reader, arithmetic and spelling. Last fall mamma proposed to her pupils to organize a Juvenile Missionary Society. We named our society "Pearl Gatherers." We have thirteen members and three dollars and six twelve cents in the treasury. The greater portion of the society being the children of Baptists, mamma (as our lady manager) suggested that we divide the money between the Methodist and Baptist Churches, to which we all agreed. I have a sweet little baby sister who also belongs to our society. Last year I collected twelve dollars missionary money, and papa gave me a nice Bible, with my name on it as a prize. Papa is the preacher in charge of this North Bossier circuit. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday, as the church is near the parsonage. Our school is not very large, as the roads are so bad. I forgot to tell you our society expects to give a concert in May, and we would be glad if you could be present and give us a lecture. We are so sorry that our dear presiding elder, Bro. McClendon, had to give up this district, for I had learned to love him almost as well as I do Bro. Randall, who was papa's presiding elder three years. For fear you will think my letter too long, I will close. Hoping you will give my letter a place in the dear old ADVOCATE, I am your little friend,

The Porter's Iron Collar.

About sixteen miles from St. Petersburg, in the midst of a wide plain, stands the Czar's country palace of Tsarskoe-Selo Czar's Village, the great park of which is a very pretty place in fine summer weather. All through June and July, you may see the Russian children running about under the trees by scores, with a shouting and laughing that would do the Czar's heart good to hear, if he were anywhere within reach. In every shady spot you are pretty sure to find a picnic party making merry on the grass, with two or three well-filled lunch-baskets beside them; and when you come to the little summer-houses near the lake, you will most likely find at least half a dozen people in each, gathered around a big bowl of prostokrash, which is the Russian name for curds and cream.

This lake is one of the great "sights" of the park, for it has a boat-house filled with a model of every kind of boat in the world, down to Greenland fishing-boats and Polynesian war-canoes; and when they are all sent floating over the lake after dark, hung with colored lamps, they make a very fine show indeed. But there is something even better worth seeing a little farther on, and that is the palace museum, filled with strange presents which have been given to the Russian Czars by various kings, savage or civilized, from a jeweled sword presented by the first Napoleon to a Persian carpet sent by the Ameer of Bokhara.

On a table near the door lies a very curious relic, which every one who comes in notices at once. It is a large silver dish, rolled up like a sheet of paper, so as to make a kind of funnel; and if you ask the old soldier who shows the museum how it came to be twisted up like that, he will give a knowing grin, and ask if you ever heard of Count Gregory Orloff.

This Gregory Orloff was a Russian count who lived about a hundred years ago, and was not only a count, but an admiral as well, though there were people who said that if he had to manage the fleet by himself, instead of having three or four excellent naval commanders to help him, he would have made a poor job of it. But whatever doubts there might be about his seamanship, there could be none about his strength, for he was one of the largest and most powerful men in Russia. Like many other giants, he was, perhaps, just a little too fond of showing off his great strength. Nothing pleased him more than to bend a horse-shoe between his fingers, or pull out of the ground a stake which no one else could move; and if one of his sailors turned mutinous, and began to make a noise, Orloff would just take him by the throat, and shake him as a cat shakes a mouse, after which the brawler was usually quiet enough.

Now, it happened that one night this strong-handed admiral was at an evening party at the palace; and as he was handing a bouquet of flowers to one of the ladies, the silver paper which was wrapped around it slipped off. Orloff said nothing, but stepped to the supper-table, and taking up a silver dish, rolled it up like a piece of paper, put the bouquet into it, and handed it to the lady; and this is the dish you see in the museum.

Not long after this, Orloff arrived in St. Petersburg from a journey, and was met at his own door by a messenger from the palace, who told him that the Empress particularly wished to see him, and that he must go to her at once. Some men would have waited to put on their finest clothes, and to make themselves look quite gay and dandified; but the admiral was used to obeying orders at once; and off he started for the palace, just as he was.

Now, while the admiral had been journeying, there had come to the palace a new hall porter who had never seen him before. This porter was a strong fellow, although not nearly as big as Orloff, and not a nice-tempered man by any means; so when he saw the admiral's big, coarse-looking, ugly figure coming up to the door of the stately palace in a dusty traveling-dress, he shouted merely:

"Be off, you vagabond! You've no business here! Who are you, I should like to know?"

Orloff never answered, but stooped and picked up a long iron bar that fastened the door at night. One jerk of his great strong hands twisted it around the porter's neck like a ribbon, so that the poor fellow had to hold up the ends.

"Now, my boy," said he, with a broad grin, "go and show yourself to the Empress with that iron collar on, and she will know who I am!"

Then the porter knew at once that this must be the terrible Count Orloff, of whose strength he had heard so much, and he fell on his knees to ask pardon. But Orloff only laughed, and told him not to be quite so ready to judge a man by his outside another time; and, indeed, from that day forth, the porter was always civil to everybody.—David Kerr, in St. Nicholas.

How Sponges are Caught.

A correspondent of the New Haven paper tells how they fish for sponges in the Bahamas. When a vessel arrives at the fishing ground, it is anchored; and the men, in small boats, proceed to look for sponges in the water below. The water is a beautiful light blue color, and so clear a six-pence can easily be seen on the white, sandy bottom in thirty-five to forty feet of water. Of course, when there is no wind and the surface of the water is still, the sponges are easily seen; but, when a gentle breeze is blowing, a "sea-glass" is used. A sea-glass consists of a square pine box about twenty inches in length, a pane of glass about ten by twelve inches placed in one end, water-tight. To use it, the glass end is thrust into the water, and the face of the operator is placed close to the other. By this means, the wave motion of the water is overcome, and the bottom readily seen. Sponges, when seen on the bottom attached to rocks, look like a big black bunch. They are pulled off their natural beds by forked hooks, which are run down under the sponge, which is formed like the head of a cabbage, and the roots pulled from the rocks. When brought to the surface, it is a mass of soft glutinous stuff, which to the touch feels like soap or thick jelly. When a small black lead is obtained; they are taken to the shore, where a crawl is built in which they are placed to die, so that the jelly substance will readily separate from the firm fiber of the sponge. These crawls are built by sticking pieces of brush into the sand, out of the water, large enough to contain the catch. It takes from five to six days for the insect to die, when the sponges are beaten with small sticks, and the black, glutinous substance falls off, leaving the sponge, after a thorough washing, ready for market. To the fishermen generally, the occupation is not a lucrative one. I am told the wages will hardly average three dollars per week, besides board. There is but little diving for sponges, except for a particularly fine bunch which can not be gotten by the hook. The sponge is formed by small insects, and is the hive in which they live. Different qualities are found growing side by side, although in certain regions the finer and more valuable sponges are found.

Marine Battles.

Among the extraordinary spectacles sometimes witnessed by those who go down to the sea in ships, none are more impressive than a combat for the supremacy between the monsters of the deep. The battles of the sword-fish and whale are described as Homeric in grandeur.

The sword-fish go in schools like whales, and the attacks are regular sea fights. When two troops meet, as soon as the sword-fish have betrayed their presence by a few bounds in the air, the whales draw together and close their ranks. The sword-fish always endeavors to take the whale in the flank, either because its cruel instinct has revealed to it the defect in the carcass—for there exists near the brachial fins of the whale a spot where wounds are mortal—or because the flank presents a wider surface for its blows.

The sword-fish recoils to secure a greater impetus. If the movement escape the keen eye of his adversary, the whale is lost, for it receives the blow of the enemy, and dies almost instantly. But if the whale perceive the sword-fish at the instant of a rush, by a spontaneous bound it springs clear of the water its entire length, and falls on its flank with a crash that resounds for many leagues, and whitens the sea with boiling foam. The gigantic animal has only its tail for defense. It tries to strike its enemy and finish him at a single blow. But if the active sword-fish avoid the fatal tail, the battle becomes more terrible. The aggressor springs from the water in his turn, falls upon the whale, and attempts not to pierce, but to saw it with the teeth that garnish its weapon. The sea is stained with blood; the fury of the whale is boundless. The sword-fish harasses him, strikes him on every side, kills and dies to other victories.

Often the sword-fish has not time to avoid the tail of the whale, and contents itself with pressing its sharp saw to the flank of the animal which is about to crush it. It then dies like Macaleens, smothered beneath the weight of the elephant of the ocean. Finally the whale gives a few last bounds into the air, dragging its assassin in its flight, and perishes as it kills the monster of which it was the victim.—Growing World.

SPELLING IN THE NURSERY.

"G-o-a," said Grace to Willie;
"What does that spell?" "I don't know;
He is three and she is seven,
"G-o-a-t Goose" "Oh, dear, no!"
"Rooster? Boy? Stick?" Each time
Gracie shook her curly head,
Naught could mend her sad giving
But a lesson-word instead.

"When a little boy shouts
At a rabbit, what goes off?"
Gracie said, her face bright and shy,
As she quaffed a little cough,
Thinking he would surely guess it.
"You're so stupid! I'm quite hoarse Talking to you." "What goes off?"
Why the rabbit does, of course."

Fraternal Agitation.

There are some things that should be regarded as settled finally. Among these we reckon the separation of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two great branches. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, became, for sufficient reasons, an independent ecclesiastical organization, and its continued existence and autonomy are not to be considered as an open question. To agitate the question of organic union can be productive of nothing but harm. It keeps up an irritation, and opens the door for disquieting and disturbing influences, that would sleep and die if the matter were permitted to disappear from the field of discussion.

Fraternity is another thing that has been settled. Nothing more is called for in this direction—certainly nothing further is needed in the way of legislation. The two churches came to a full and amicable understanding on this point, arranged their pending differences, and now treat each other as equal and legitimate branches of the parent stock. The courtesies which are due from one Christian church to another are freely extended, and there is friendly recognition, and a constant interchange of brotherly salutations, between the two great representative bodies. If any personal or local antagonisms exist, these are comparatively few and insignificant, and in time will disappear.

What occasion there is for further talk or discussion about fraternity we can not see. Nothing more is to be done, and nothing more can be. The provisions agreed upon by the Cape May Commission have been carried out in good faith by the Southern Church and the Northern Church accepted them as a finality. The two churches are as near to each other as they need be, or as they well can be and maintain a separate existence. There is, we believe, an understanding between the two churches in regard to their foreign mission work so as to avoid seeming conflict. Something of this kind was contemplated in the Cape May settlement, in regard to the home work, but thus far without practical results. Which side is most lacking in practical fraternity, in this erecting of altar against altar, it would not be difficult to show. The blame, if it rests upon either, does not rest upon us. We are fraternal. We can go no further in this direction. It only remains for each church to attend to its own affairs, and to do the work to which it has been providentially called.

Why then this continual agitation? If the autonomy of our church is settled, if fraternity is settled, what is the drift or object of this agitation? Is something more than fraternity meant, and is it intended, by this clamor about fraternity, to help on the Northern policy of disintegration and absorption? So far as we can discover, there is but one question left between the two Methodisms, and that is the question of organic union. This is the drift of the agitation, and in some instances it would appear to be the covert hope and design. Dr. Carlisle, the accomplished president of Wofford College, in a recent article in the Southern Christian Advocate, says:

> A few years ago a writer in these columns said that Southern Methodists could be divided into four classes with reference to fraternity. 1. Those who never have any use for it. 2. Those who will submit to it, as an inevitable humiliation. 3. Those who, in some sense, wish it, but do not feel it a duty or privilege to raise a hand, or move a tongue, or pen to hasten it. 4. Those who not only wish for it, and pray for it, but are willing, even anxious to work for it, as for one of the grandest Christian achievements in reach of this generation. Perhaps all these classes still have their representatives, but there is reason to believe the fourth is the growing one, all technical obstacles having been removed.

If fraternity means fraternity only, it seems to us that it has already been achieved. We do not know that Dr. Carlisle wishes for anything more than fraternity. If he merely wishes to promote peace and a good understanding between the two churches, we imagine there is no difference of opinion on this point. Dr. Kelley, in his article in the Quarterly Review, declares against organic union, and yet the general tenor of his article is calculated to weaken his position. There are some who are again advocating the change of our name by cutting off "South." A prominent man in our German work informs us that this change would simply wipe us out among his people, and our friends on the old border, and beyond, may find this to be true of their work should this measure be consummated. It would be tantamount to hauling down the old flag and surrendering at discretion.

Apart, however, from any explicit declarations, for as yet such declarations have not been made in influential quarters, the general drift of this agitation can scarcely be mistaken. It can have but one objective point. In the judgment of some of these brethren, organic union may not be expedient at present, but the fruit is ripening, and the way is being prepared. We impugn the motives of none, but we can not but feel that this fraternal agitation, which means much more than fraternity, is most unfortunate. Not that we believe that organic union can be effected, but that the question keeps up a ferment and a constant disturbance, and is calculated to cripple and weaken the church and to drive from us those who wish for peace and congenial affiliations. Internal dissension and bitter conflict are sure to be engendered by opening this question of organic union, and, if persisted in, may lead to a most calamitous disruption among ourselves.

We sincerely believe that it is for the best interests of both churches that they remain apart, that the aggregate growth and good done will be greater, and that the cause of Christ will be promoted by continuing as they are. The division resulted in blessings which are almost too great to be estimated now; and we do not doubt that its continuance will bear the noblest and best fruits.

The Fear of Death.

"The king of terrors," quoted from Bildad the Shuhite in Job, is generally accepted as a description of death. In the earliest ages death was regarded as the crowned monarch in the realm of the terrible, as the embodiment and highest manifestation of the fearful. In the feeling and convictions of all the ages this title of death has been accepted. Paul speaks of death as reigning—as a sovereign holding sway over the generations of men.

As there is naturally an instinctive clinging to life, so there is a natural aversion to death. But there are moral elements involved in the thought of death. It is somehow connected with sin, so that, besides the instinctive shrinking from it, there is the consciousness of guilt, and often of accountability and judgment. If death were merely a natural phenomenon, separated from all moral considerations, it could hardly be the sovereign of all that is most to be feared. Death owes its terrors to sin. As a terrible thing death is by sin. If there had been no sin, there had been no fear of death. If there had been bodily dissolution or change, there would have been nothing in it to excite aversion or apprehension. "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." Here we have the reason of the terrible in death.

And death, as connected with sin, is also somehow connected with the devil. "Him that had the power of death; that is, the devil." The devil, through sin, may be said to have brought death into the world, and he still endeavors to wield it for his own malignant purposes. It is his work and instrument, and his dark and baneful presence is felt in the dying throes of the ungodly, and in the misery which the anticipation of death excites. Without Christ, or the revelation of future blessedness, men are in bondage to the fear of death. "Who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." The soul is bound by this chain. The fear of death is as a gloomy prison-house. It binds, disables, shuts up the spirit, and crushes out the real manhood. Without God death reduces us to the condition of cowering slaves.

This was the state of the world without the gospel, and it is the condition of those who are not building upon Christ as "the Prince of life." The thought of death may be temporarily dismissed, and the tormenting fear may be held in check by absorbing pleasures or business. But the dismal vision will sometimes break through, and none can entirely dispel the repulsive conviction. Amidst our recreations, our busy pursuits, and the race for wealth and honor, there is always this solemn undertone, and murmur of a coming catastrophe.

How fearful death is to most men is exhibited in the general endeavor to banish the very thought of it. There have been those who, without Christ, have seemed to meet death without fear. Throwing off all convictions of God and of a future life, they have resigned themselves to the inevitable, and to annihilation. And there are those who contemplate death without hope, and as the end of all, and avowedly are not afraid. It is with them rather the indifference of despair. Fear, if really overcome, is overcome at the expense of their moral sensibility, and by the sacrifice of the noblest aspirations, and the grandest attributes of human character. Not to fear death is something abnormal, unusual, apart from the hopes of the gospel.

Christ is the only Saviour from this tormenting fear. He died "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death; that is, the devil; and deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Deliverance from this fear is among the clearest privileges of the Christian. Dying grace is, of course, for the dying hour, but there is also a grace in life which divests death of its appalling aspect, and delivers from the fear of it. Some Christians perhaps never quite overcome the sense of terror in life, and we have known such to triumph in the final struggle. A lingering apprehension or a trace of fear should not discredit our hope, but there is a more excellent way. It is the office of perfect love to cast out fear, and when the spirit of adoption is in the heart, crying Abba Father, death can not be the king of terrors. A full tide of spiritual life in the soul, the love of God shed abroad in the heart, and faith in Christ as "the resurrection and the life," will dispel the cloud. This victory over the fear of death is a victory in life, a positive triumph that floods all our days with light, that abolishes death as the disquieter of the soul, and that makes life and immortality a present assurance and possession.

Spiritual Declension.

On all sides we hear the complaint of a general decline in the spirituality of members of the church. From every quarter we hear the cry that worldliness is encroaching upon Zion, and not seldom presenting its hideous effronteries in the "holy of holies." The fact of spiritual declension seems plain to even a casual observer. As the teaching of Christ and his apostles shows clearly that the church and the world are in their nature separate and distinct, and can not be joined without the destruction of one by the other, or the absorption of one in the other, and as spirituality is the first and last and best test by which the genuineness of the church is to be determined, spiritual declension simply means that the world is absorbing the church. If such is the fact, there must be some reason for it. If the fact is of sufficient magnitude to threaten the progress and very existence of the church then a knowledge of the cause of the fact will be greatly helpful in arriving at the remedies which shall counteract and destroy the fact. There may be a complication of causes. Perhaps there are many causes, all working together to this very end. Some may think the cause of all this loss of spirituality is due to the preaching of the pulpits. Others may suppose that the slackness in the administration of the Discipline of the church accounts for it. The preaching of the times may have somewhat to do in this matter, but, if so, it is very remote. The slackness of Discipline has nothing to do with it at all. The direct agency here is the neglect of the word of God. The almost universal neglect of church members to read and meditate daily upon the word of the Lord is the first and foremost cause of spiritual decline. The reason is this: The word of God is the only spiritual food. This truth was announced by Moses, and reannounced by our Saviour under the most peculiar and awful circumstances. Man is a spiritual being. God says this spiritual nature must be supplied with proper nourishment in order to life and growth. God has placed the supply in easy reach. Now, when people neglect to take this spiritual food their spiritual natures weaken, and sicken and die. There is no alternative. If a man neglects to take food into his stomach, and persists in that neglect, everybody can very easily forecast the result. The same law obtains in the spiritual realm. The soul needs food. The word of God is that food. Neglect to appropriate it issues in spiritual death. It is a sad sight to see people regularly, every morning, take their baskets and go to the market-places to procure the supplies necessary for the nourishment of their physical natures, and yet leave their souls to famish in want for that which is so easily obtainable. And this goes on day after day and week after week, and church people wonder what is the matter! There is no wonder about it. It is the simplest kind of a thing. Do we wonder at the weakening of a man's strength and the shrinking of his muscles and the thinning of his blood when we know that he persists in fasting from day to day and from week to week? The word of God read and prayed over is the only nourishment of the spiritual nature. Preaching the gospel can not take the place of this. Perhaps some have made this mistake, endeavoring to atone for their neglect by hearing much preaching. How would it do for a man to neglect bread and try drinking much water? Everything in its place. God says his word is the food for our souls. He says: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." If we believe God, then the remedy for spiritual declension is prescribed and duty plain.

Mississippi Notes.

The Legislature adjourned yesterday, the ninth instant, after a session of a little over two months. It will be more remarkable for what was not done than for any important measures passed. Apart from the passage of a large number of local bills and railroad charters, very little was accomplished. To harmonize all shades of opinion, and crystalize them into laws, is a wearisome exercise. In a Mississippi Legislature may be found every variety of opinion, political and economical, from the rigid conservative to the iconoclastic radical, from old fogy to young American. One thing was very evident—quite a number of Legislators were anxious to make a record for future political preferment. But few would refuse a nomination for Congress. This was so patent and prominent that some thought it controlled largely in their position on certain and sundry measures. The local option bill, which passed the House, was defeated in the Senate by a few votes. In that body the strongest argument urged against it was injury to the party. Senators said we dare not go to the people with a prohibitory law on our statute-books. This was a bold acknowledgment that whisky dominated in the political aspirations of many men. They could afford to snub the temperance sentiment of the State, but to arouse the alcoholic lion would imperil the party. No Legislature ever met in this capital that had stronger, more numerous and more urgent appeals for repressive laws against liquor, and no body of representatives has been so little disposed to grant their prayers. The temporizing and artful dodges of certain gentlemen will be remembered when the melancholy days of future Novembers shall roll around.

The "Pint Law" was repealed—had scarcely a friend to plead for its continued disgraceful existence. A large number of bills were passed prohibiting the sale of liquor within three or five miles of certain schools, churches and towns. Another measure has become a law, which indicated a revival of conscience—an act prohibiting the sale or purchase of futures in the State. This is a great and growing evil. It is said that a little town, in less than thirty miles of the capital, has lost fully $30,000, within the past few weeks, in cotton futures. Whether this law is drawn with sufficient care to arrest it remains to be seen.

The appointments made by the Governor to the various judgships seem to give eminent satisfaction. In his estimate of men Gov. Lowry excels. He has unusual practical wisdom, and has entered upon his administration with the entire confidence and esteem of the State. His place in the sanctuary on Sunday morning is never vacant, and in this he sets a commendable example to those gentlemen who imagine the cares of official life prevent the discharge of religious obligations.

All reports from our colleges are cheering, notwithstanding the floods and money stringency of the times. A comparison of our present with past Conference institutions marks the changes of time. Colleges, like poor mortals, have no continuing city. We have only one female college to-day in the Conference that existed twenty-eight years ago. To the General Conference of 1854 the Mississippi Conference reported seven female colleges, with patronage as follows: Sharon Female College, 70 pupils; Felicilana Institute, Jackson, La., 60 pupils; Fayette Female Academy, 50 pupils; Withnarth Hall, Natchez, 60 pupils; Port Gibson Collegiate Academy, 110 pupils; Raymond Female Academy, 95 pupils; Jackson Wesleyan College, 65 pupils. Of all these Port Gibson, like Job's messenger, "only am escaped alone" to tell the present generation of our former prosperity. The same year Centenary College matriculated 220 students. Instead of seven we now have four female institutions, but their aggregate patronage exceeds that of ante-bellum days. Anent this subject of education Rev. Dr. Curry, in a recent address before the American Institute of Instruction, has made some rather startling revelations. His facts and figures, it is hoped, will correct the purblindness of the sectional Phariseeism that has been accustomed to look upon the South as an educational Sodom and Gomorrah. He said:

> The South before the war, in proportion to white population, taking man for man, sustained a larger number of colleges, with more professors, more students, and a greater annual cost than was done in any section of the Union. The same thing is true of academies and private schools. If the census of 1880, as taken by the United States authorities, be correct, the white population of the Northern States in that year was nearly 19,000,000, and of the Southern a little over 8,000,000. At that time the North had 205 colleges, the South 262; the North had 1407 professors, the South 1188; the North had 59,044 students, the South 27,055; the North paid for these colleges $1,514,293, the South $1,662,416.

The statement is going the rounds of the papers that a number of family residences in Columbus were connected by telephone with the Methodist Church in that city, a few Sabbaths past, and it is variously commented on by the secular press. All consider it a measure of doubtful utility. Some are wicked enough to intimate that it might encourage an unsanctified religious ease, and also save pew rent. On the other hand, it would be a benediction to the very aged and afflicted. At all events it indicates the power and popularity of Pastor Steel. The people are determined to hear him, even at long range.

The war between the two Baptist papers in the State has waxed warm. The Record has cut the acquaintance of the Southern Baptist—stricken it from the exchange list—and vowed never to notice it again. These brethren are both land-markers, but one is slightly hard-shell. As a Methodist neighbor, right on the line between the two, we command peace. Judah and Ephraim must not vex each other so. There is too much sin in Mississippi to allow mutiny in the ranks of Israel.

THE FLOODS.

The floods and the rains combined seem actually fearful, even here at Yazoo City, situated chiefly on the slope of a hill, from any part of which one may walk in ten minutes to the top of a point two hundred feet above the valley, over which the waters are spreading. The view from the hill-top near the city is really wonderful and fearful to contemplate. Water, water, water, shining everywhere over the vast valley that stretches westward till earth and sky seem to meet. There, though in the distance it seems to be still, it is winding, circling, creeping, oozing through thickets and fences, along bayous and all low places, advancing gradually, covering by degrees the higher lands, slipping under houses and sneaking by night up to the door sills, and finally moistening the carpets and covering the floors till one must become amphibious or leave. The inhabitants have not yet been run out of the Yazoo valley. They still hope that their higher lands and their houses will be spared the approaches of the flood. Yet there is no certainty of safety. The water has been rising an inch an hour for the last twenty-four hours, but this has been caused, in part, by heavy rains. By walking fifty yards from the door of the Methodist Church in this place one may see the water pushing its trash-covered surface up the gutter like the head of a huge serpent. People in the lower portions of the town are moving their furniture and abandoning their houses. On the upper Yazoo and on Silver Creek and Sunflower river the floods have recently become dangerous, and are daily more threatening of a general inundation. Plowing and planting are of course suspended for the present in all the flat country. Work on farms has been going on quite briskly in the hills of late. A gentleman from the hill region of Yazoo told me on yesterday that he had finished planting his upland corn. The health of the people in this region seems to be generally good. The great concern felt about the overflow appears to have displaced the popular dread of smallpox. We hear nothing of that now. The nearer evil demands exclusive attention for the time. It is to be hoped that the waters will subside in time for much planting in the swamp, as it is called. Meanwhile we shall probably have frequent and copious rains, both in the valley of the Mississippi and on the adjacent hill country for some hundreds of miles, since the atmosphere of all this region must for some time be surcharged with vapor arising from the vast area of water covering the great valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

The preachers of Jackson district are all at their posts, striving to fulfill the duties of their calling. While there are no extraordinary outward demonstrations to be seen, we trust that the work of grace is being steadily promoted in many hearts, and that good seeds are being sown, whose fruits shall be gathered in due season.

The present year, or at least the first six months of it, will probably be a very hard time financially with people in general, and especially with our preachers. They will have need to husband every dollar. Already I have heard rumors of scarcity bordering on distress in some preachers' families. Let our stewards be found faithful, and bestir themselves, that our preachers may not suffer. The Lord will provide if we will.

Some of the correspondents of this ADVOCATE, I see, do not agree with my views on foreign immigration. This is not surprising. The subject will bear discussion. I should regret very much to think that anything in my article provoked or instilled the spirit of Bro. B.'s reply. The arguments of the brethren are not conclusive to my mind. Even figures here may prove delusive witnesses. I shall not now enter into controversy with the advocates of immigration. It seems to me very unwise to encourage foreigners to come to these States. Not one cent would I give to hire or help them to come. On the contrary, it seems to me that foreign immigration should be carefully restricted. Especially would I warn our people against expecting any great relief from pecuniary or other embarrassments through foreign immigration. Almost every day I meet with gentlemen of experience in the higher circles of business life who hold substantially the views which I have advocated on this subject. The late Dr. J. P. Newman is quoted as saying "Massachusetts, Maine and Connecticut are in the hands of foreigners. The South may yet prove the sheet-anchor of the Republic, because she has been comparatively free from foreign immigration, and consequently from Sabbath desecration."

I would keep the South comparatively free from foreign immigration if I could, believing that her prosperity in all things would be promoted by such a policy.

W. L. C. H.

From the German Work.

The immigrants must be brought to Christ. They are here; more are coming; Columbus was the first. True missionary zeal will make us feel glad that the foreigners are coming to us, instead of being constrained to go to them with the glad tidings of salvation. Immigration saves our missionary treasury much money.

The members of our German Conference work faithfully, and some even heroically for our Master's cause. Nothing less will satisfy me, nor our church, than that all the German immigrants shall enjoy experimental religion. That accomplished, I am little concerned about the State.

In Louisiana, Texas and Mississippi, not a few of the "dry-bones" have been animated by the breath of the Lord. Monday, February 13, I spent at Osyka; had good congregations; administered the Lord's Supper at night. Owing to the poverty of the members, our German church at that place is not yet finished. Our American Methodists at Osyka have no church. They should fall in line with our German brethren; help finish the building, and occupy it alternately if not jointly. A few days later I visited Clinton, La.; preached in our American church Friday night, February 17, to the Germans of that interesting village. Good feeling. Bro. Powell, our preacher in charge, showed me much kindness. On the following day I visited the German settlement, four miles west of Clinton, called Buetoville. Here we have a church organization with a membership of thirty-six. Preached twice on Sunday; administered the Lord's Supper, and took eight persons into the church. A church is now being built at this place. Bro. F. Bueto donated for this purpose three acres of land to our church. Our American brethren should assist these German brethren with their sympathy, prayers and money.

Monday, February 27, I fulfilled the promise made to our lamented Bro. Krauter, namely: to take his two little orphans to their grandparents in Texas. Preached on the following night to a large German congregation at Houston. Old Bro. Pauly was one of my hearers. Took the cars the same night and arrived at Lake Charles at daybreak on Wednesday. Preached in our German church, morning and night, and administered the Lord's Supper. Returned to New Orleans in time to hold my regular weekly lecture at Dryades Street Church, Thursday night. There being a protracted meeting held at Soraparu Street German Church, I officiated there on Friday night. Altar crowded with mourners; two conversions; one accession. Preached to good congregations twice on yesterday at my church, and held a love-feast at Soraparu Street Church in the evening.

Now, do not be afraid of the immigrants; at least, not of the Germans.

Positivism provides for the private as well as public worship of humanity. Woman is the special object of private worship, because she is the most perfect representative of immunity. As "mother, she excites veneration; as wife, affection; as daughter, kindness." To excite these sentiments, the ideal woman is to be worshiped. The object for public worship is "the memory of great men," Moses, Cæsar, Mahomet, who are all patron saints of the new religion. This public worship is ritualistic. The ritual, as prepared by Comte, is an elaborate formula for the worship of humanity by means of homages and festivals to its most illustrious representatives. He adopted the whole ritual of Romanism, its fasts, festivals and saints' days, to the purposes of Positivist devotion. He published "a catechism of" belief, and provided for ten sacraments. The duties of the priesthood of Positivism are very comprehensive and peculiar. Besides preaching sermons to incite men to "seek the good, the true and the beautiful," they are to have "control over all human affairs—over education, politics, social organization and religion. They are to act as arbitrators in all disputes, to be consulted in all important matters in actual life, public and private;" or, in the words of this city's new-fledged apostle of Positivism, its ministers are to "be the one to whom lads and lasses would come with their tales of woe to ask here a word of comfort and there a word of guidance." Consistently enough, since there is no God to hear, he has abandoned all "petitional prayer." In its place we are told that a recent service in London began with an invocation—"In the name of Humanity! Love, our Principle! Order, the Basis; Progress, the End, Live for others! Live openly." This mummery is called "communion with our best thoughts." If it is that, it reveals an astonishing poverty of mental resources.

Southern Christian Advocate.

When a man has lived twenty, thirty years in business, and in his older life has made a failure, he goes down. There is nothing more for him to do now but take some modest position if he can get it, and lead the rest of his life as best he can. But suppose after he had made his failure, some one could take him by the hand to show him how his failure was made, could give him information by which he could yet succeed; could give him the capital by which he might try again and succeed; so that his future life would be more successful than the former; what a change for the better that would be! But alas! there is no one to take him by the hand; he can not be taught, and he is left to go down and become worse off, until death rids him of his troubles. And yet this taking the falling man by the hand, is the meaning of repentance and the benefit of the death and life of Christ. A man has failed in his duty to God and his fellow men; let alone, he goes down and deeper. But there is One who can and will lift him up and instruct him how he made his failure, and will help him to make no more. Christ puts him in a better place than he has ever occupied, so that his future life will be better and sweeter than before; and will ensure him a still better life when he has changed this and goes into that other world, to which all are hastening. Now if the merchant who has failed, would rejoice to be thus helped and made successful, how much more should the man who has failed and is sinking, rejoice to have opportunity offered, by which he too may be reclaimed and placed in a situation where all past failures will be forgiven and the future made bright and joyous!

The Richmond Christian Advocate, of March 2, says:

On Sabbath afternoon there was held in Broad street church a service in memory of Bishop Wightman, Rev. J. W. Bledsoe directed the exercises, Rev. P. A. Peterson read an excellent biographical paper on the late Bishop. Dr. Starr followed with an address, which, in fitness for the occasion and felicity in thought and style, was worthy of the classic, elegant and devout pulpit orator it illustrated and commemorated. The dew was on it. The smell and freshness of the meadow lingered about it. There was nothing of the dust and dryness of the ruling press. The estimate of the good and noble father in the church was just and discriminating. The praise was not overspeech, but judicious and sincere. It is regretted that no notes were taken of this admirable eulogy. Dr. Starr spoke without memoranda.

Dr. Sledd, owing to the lateness of the hour, declined to make his address, much to the disappointment of the audience.

Rev. J. W. Williams writing from Las Vegas, New Mexico, to the Richmond Christian Advocate, says:

The churches are well represented here, as far as number is concerned. There are Presbyterians, Methodists, (North and South) Baptists and congregationalists. All have houses of worship except the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Bro. Welsh my Presiding Elder, and I have worked hard to get money to build a house of worship. We found that the people were not disposed to aid in the erection of another church. We therefore determined to see what could be done in the way of building a female seminary. This seemed to take with the people; so we went to work, and have in good subscriptions twenty-five hundred dollars. We intend to have a chapel in this institution, and in this way get a place of worship. The building has been let, and is being put up. It will be 52x52 feet, with vestibule, two rooms above and two below—very much like the Pace building at Randolph Macon, though not so large. As soon as completed we want to get a first class man of experience to take charge of it.

Our church is growing in membership. We began two months ago with seventeen members, and now have twenty. If we can average three every two months we shall do well. Our Sunday-school has grown from nineteen to thirty-eight. Tell Bro. Laurens that we organized on yesterday, a Rosebud Society, and have to begin with eighteen members. The Secretary will write Uncle Larry in due time. These are the first missionary rosebuds in New Mexico.

I have just returned from a visit to Don Trinidad Romero, a wealthy Spaniard who, though a Catholic, gave me fifty dollars for our seminary.

I sometimes catch myself looking wistfully towards the sunrise. You can't imagine how earnestly I desire to see the dear old State of Virginia. Pray for us, and may God bless you.

THREE METHODISMS BETTER THAN ONE.—Under the above heading the "Christian Neighbor" has these sensible words:

Rather than attempt to form the two Methodisms in one, let the platform of a third Methodism be put together, on which all who are in favor of the organic union of the Northern and Southern Methodist Churches may meet and become one. Any attempt to unite the two churches would cause, we believe, a large number of Methodists to leave the church North and the church South; and probably as many more would leave after the trial of making the twain one. We are in favor of fraternal relations—fraternal feelings and actions—as much as some over whose dreams there has come of late days an ambiguous sweetness rather long drawn out. Let each Methodism seek a closer union with God and abide under its own vine and fig tree and do its own work, provoking one another to love and good works. If this don't suit certain brethren let them make a platform of their own and get on it.

We regret to learn that Mrs. Cox, wife of the former editor of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist, died March 6. The following notice of her death is from the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist of March 8:

We regret to report that Mrs. Augusta M. Cox, wife of Rev. Dr. Cox, died on Monday morning at her home, No. 231 W. Lombard street. Though Mrs. Cox has been an invalid for twenty years her death was unexpected. She was the daughter of Mr. W. W. Binney, of Washington, D. C., and was married to Dr. Cox in 1849. She was a lady of culture, and possessed many traits of character which endeared her to a large circle of friends. We pray earnestly that our brother may be comforted in this hour of sorrow, and many join us in offering him our heartfelt sympathies.

ITINERATING IN THE FLOOD.—Our brethren in the overflowed regions are having a most trying time. Rev. B. F. Alexander, presiding elder of the Delhi district, Louisiana Conference, writing from Delhi, March 6, says:

The water is terrible in my district. Suppose two-thirds or three-fourths of the land is now under water. But I have missed no appointment on that account; nor do I expect to if there is any way for the people to reach the places of worship by land or water. I can go and will do so if the people will. Though transportation is rather high on the railroad's skiff line, say more than twenty cents per mile. The country abounds in water and buffalo gnats, and is scarce of provisions and money; but blessed with an abundance of good health. The gnats are worse than ever before; so say the old inhabitants. They are killing some stock, though not much as more attention is paying to the protection of stock than usual. I keep my horse in the stable from daylight till dark. Gnats do not bite at night.

Very little plantation work done as yet, and but little gardening until last week.

Rev. J. W. Medlock, writing from Vienna, La., March 3, says:

A terrible tornado passed through this country on the night of February 27, demolishing fencing, out-houses, and some residences, and completely destroying all the large timber in its track. Some few persons were injured, and I learn that one or two lives were lost. We are now having beautiful spring weather, and farmers are busily getting ready for the new crop. Times are unusually hard, owing to last year's drouth, but the people are in good heart.

The London Methodist is informed that the pecuniary accounts of the Ecumenical Conference were not only cleared without calling for any portion of the guarantee fund, but the treasurer finds himself with $150 on hand.

The society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, which has worshipped since December 31, 1856, at the corner of Washington avenue and Eighth street, St. Louis, held a farewell service on last Sunday. The services were very interesting, Rev. Dr. Goodbody reading a historical sketch of the society. A new house of worship will be erected on the corner of Dayton and Glasgow avenue.

Rev. John E. Edwards, writing in the Southern Christian Advocate, says:

To those who knew anything of the condition of Mrs. Doggett's health, (widow of Bishop Doggett,) for the last few months, her death was not a great surprise. She had really been very feeble ever since the death of her sainted husband. The event was not a surprise to her. She was quietly and patiently expecting it. Mrs. Doggett was a woman of sterling worth. She died as she lived—meeting death as she met the afflictions of life—with a sublime heroism. Her faith was simple; her confidence in God abiding; her death tranquil. She leaves three sons and two daughters, all left in comfortable circumstances from the estate of their father.

"CHINA AND HER PEOPLE."—Under this heading Rev. J. W. Lambuth, our veteran missionary in China, will contribute to our columns a number of articles. They are specially designed for our young people, but the older people will find them entertaining and instructive. We are greatly obliged to Bro. Lambuth for this service, and we have no doubt his articles will be productive of much good. The first article will be published on our third page next week. In a private note dated Shanghai, China, January 30, 1882, Bro. Lambuth says: "My health is much improved, and I hope to be quite well again. We are very much encouraged in our work and see signs of great interest among the people, and constant growth in grace among the native converts. We need more men and more women, consecrated men and women to help us in this work."

In our news columns will be found further details of the inundation. The worst has not yet been reached in Louisiana, and the suffering in the overflowed sections must continue for one or two months to come.

Every day we hear of additional crevasses, and increased destruction of stock, houses and other improvements. An attempt was made, on Sunday morning, by some miscreant to cut the levee in front of the upper part of New Orleans. Fortunately it was discovered in time to avert disaster. Our levees are now guarded by armed men. We have heard of other instances in which the levees have been cut maliciously. In the country parishes, and wherever there is exposure to overflow, there is this danger. The prospect of plunder, the hope of government rations, and sometimes pure diabolism, seem to be the incentive. Alas! for human nature. These times of calamity are the occasion for the display of the worst, and also of the best qualities of men.

Generally there is hope of a subsidence of the waters in time to plant and secure at least a partial crop. It is a time of wide-spread destitution, of painful suspense, and also, we trust, of prayer.

—The editorial connection of Dr. Samuel K. Cox, with the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist, terminated with the issue of March 8. Rev. W. K. Boyle has bought the paper and now becomes its editor and publisher. We are sorry to lose Dr. Cox from our Southern Methodist Journalism. During the six years in which he has filled the editorial chair, he has done honor to the position, and has been a faithful exponent and advocate of Christianity and of Methodism. In retiring from the arduous position which he has occupied with fidelity and ability, we wish him health and prosperity. Under his successor may the paper continue to flourish, and to increase in popular favor and usefulness.

—And still they come! We mean articles without the name and address of the writers. Obituaries, marriages, and articles on various subjects—one just now received in each of these departments—are coming in every week sometimes with initials of the name, sometimes signed, "A Friend," and sometimes with no signature whatever. The editor must have the name and address of those who write for these columns. Please do not forget this. The name will be withheld from publication when desired. Ordinarily, however, it is best for people to write over their true name.

—A gentleman who attended, when a youth, the ministry of Dr. Linfield at Baton Rouge sends us through Rev. J. T. Daves, a contribution to the relief of Bro. Linfield in his misfortunes. We have remitted it to the family at Hazlehurst, Miss. A good deed which is its own reward.

—J. H. Muse, Esq., on our third page this week, gives his impressions of the life and character of Judge Edward McGehee, and furnishes some interesting reminescences of that truly great and good man.

—We invite special attention to the notice, on our first page, of the Mississippi Conference Woman's Missionary Society. It is important that the meeting at Crystal Springs, April 6, be well attended.

—Mr. Coukling and Senator Edmunds have both declined the vacant position on the supreme bench of the United States. Strange to say, the former was confirmed by the Senate by a decided majority.

—We are indebted to Rev. Wm. C. Power, secretary, for a copy of the minutes of the recent session of the South Carolina Conference. The work is very complete in every respect.

Says the Nashville Christian Advocate of March 4:

The Rev. Dr. William Crook and the Rev. Oliver McCutcheon, of the Irish Methodist Church, are in Nashville at this writing. They have come to the United States to appeal for aid to enable the United Methodist Church of Ireland to carry on its important work in that country. These brethren have made a most favorable impression upon our people here. They occupied our principle pulpits last Sabbath, and their ministrations were highly edifying to the large congregations to whom they dispensed the word of life. They preached the pure gospel with simplicity, clearness, power, and unction. Nashville Methodists responded cordially to this appeal, and will have a pleasant remembrance of the visit of these able and warm-hearted Irish Methodists.

Rev. G. M. Liverman, writing from Evergreen, La., says: "Wife and children are still at Kenchie, and I do not know when they will come if Alexandria goes under. I have a house at Evergreen, and will be snugly domiciled when they come. High water is all the talk, and still it comes. I have but little of it as yet."

Rev. C. M. Roper, pastor of Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in East Selma, Ala., writing March 10, says: "Church work is very promising. Good feeling pervades the membership, and large congregations give token of increased interest in all classes of our people. We are hoping and praying for a genuine revival—and we expect it soon."

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The fourth Annual Meeting of the General Executive Association, Woman's Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will convene in Nashville, Tenn., Thursday, May 18, 1882. All delegates are requested to communicate immediately with the corresponding secretary of the Tennessee Conference Society, stating if it is their intention to attend the meeting. Delegates will be provided with pleasant homes.

It will be a season of special interest to Southern Methodism as the General Conference will be in session at same time and place. All who attend will be cordially welcomed.

TO OUR AGENTS.—The publisher would be greatly obliged if all agents would remit promptly collections for subscriptions, or, at least once a month, send amount on hand with names from whom collected. It is hoped that extra efforts will be made this year to secure a large number of new subscribers, and as the General Conference will meet in May, the paper will be unusually interesting and of great value to every member of the church.

The periodicals of the Western House are issued in the English, German and Swedish languages—and the report shows that no class of Methodists equal the Germans in conducting and sustaining our periodical literature published in their own language.

The Committee were particularly gratified by that part of the report of the Agents at New York, touching the progress in paying the bonded debt incurred in the year 1880 by the purchase of the property at 805 Broadway.

The old 7 per cent. bonds have been called in and paid or refunded at a lower rate of interest, so that the bonded debt is now only about $260,000 funded at five per cent. The Agents here say: "We were gratified to find that we had no difficulty in disposing of the new bonds, and we were obliged to decline applications for many which we could not supply."

The Western Concern has also been able to reduce its indebtedness, besides making a very favorable sale of a large amount of real estate in Cincinnati which it had carried for many years.

The total sales of both houses are found to be slightly less than in 1880, caused mainly by reduction in price of the Christian Advocate at New York; yet the Committee were fully satisfied that the financial condition of the publishing interests of the church was never better than now.

The Earl of Kellie was relating an account of a sermon which he had heard in Italy, in which the preacher described the alleged miracle of St. Anthony preaching to the fishes, and in which his hearers were so much entranced by his eloquence that they actually held their heads up out of the water.

"I can believe the miracle," said Henry Erskine, "if your lordship was at church."

"I was certainly there," replied the Earl.

"Then," said Erkskine, "there was at least one fish out of water."

☞ We shall do our best to exclude fraudulent advertisements of every description from the ADVOCATE, and trust our friends, in ordering goods from the leading merchants of New Orleans and elsewhere, as represented in our columns, will mention having seen the advertisement in the ADVOCATE. We will also take pleasure in attending personally to any commissions for our friends to the country with which we may be favored, while endorsing our advertisers as being worthy of their patronage.

Mr. Philip Werlein, 124 Canal street, New Orleans, can sell you a good Halle piano for $225, cash and $10 monthly for fifteen months, no interest, including stool and cover. They are guaranteed for six years. This piano will be shipped to you on the condition that you are not satisfied there is to be no sale and he pays all charges of freights. That is certainly very fair and shows the confidence that Mr. Werlein has in his pianos. A good organ with 9 stops will be sold for $75, payable $5 cash and $5 per month for ten months, if not satisfactory no sale. Write at once and supply your family with an instrument of one kind or another.

On a Sunday, when the pastor of one of the leading Presbyterian churches was absent from his pulpit, several persons expressed dissatisfaction at seeing a stranger in the pulpit, and one lady said she would not have come if she had known that Dr. —— was not going to preach. An elder standing near very promptly replied, "Madame the worship of Dr. —— will be resumed next Sabbath."

"I must say that I very much dislike this ostentatious parade," remarked the elderly Miss Pringle as she looked about her at the new home of the Spanklingtons. "Now, look at that great elaborately framed mirror. I declare I can see nothing beautiful in it." "You shouldn't expect impossibilities, Miss Pringle," remarked Fogg.

Beneficent Nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Laplace's Indian Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

"You have heard my love, that Amanda is about to marry Arthur? I know it too, what I can't understand is that a woman as intelligent as she can consent to marry a man stupid enough to marry her."

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Shevar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proved in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. Agricultural.

The farmer in the paper
Read the editorial mentions
That the fate of nations rested
On the C. and G. conventions.

But the trees had leaved and blossomed,
And the grass continued growing;
All the sprouts of corn were starting,
And the farmer went on hoeing.

When the matter was decided,
And they made the nomination,
One declared it was a blessing
And another ruination.

Still the fruit grew ripe and mellow,
And the wheat was nicely growing,
While the farmer in his garden
Plow'd his turnips went on hoeing.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S OPINION.—If you are a farmer dissatisfied with your work in life, or a young man who thinks tarming beneath him, or a professional man who sneers at agricultural pursuits, or simply a curious reader glad to know the opinion of a great man on a great subject, read the anecdote which the "Boston Journal" tells of Daniel Webster. Daniel Webster visited John Taylor, who worked on the Webster farm, in 1852. Taylor, in speaking of him at that time, said:

"His health and bodily strength are good for a man of his age. I will give you a sample: Last Friday week we had fourteen tons of English hay well made and ready to put in the barn in the afternoon. It was a busy day on the farm, and all who could handle a rake or pitchfork were pressed into the service. When we came in to lunch in the forenoon Mr. Webster entered the kitchen, and in a playful manner and tone said:

"'John Taylor, what wages will you give me to work for you this afternoon?'

"'I will give you half a dollar, sir.'

"'Why, John Taylor, I can not afford to work for that price; and you underrate my abilities. I can pitch as much hay as any other man.'

"'It is on the supposition, sir, that you are a good hand that I offer you those wages. We got our best men for $1 a day,' I replied.

"'If that is the case, John Taylor, I am your man. I will finish my correspondence with the department, eat an early dinner and be ready to take the field with you.' As mooning on that day was short, and by the time the teams were ready Mr. Webster made his appearance, we drove into the field. The hay lay in winrows. Mr. Webster and myself pitched on the same cart. He took a winrow on one side and I the other. A ton was put on the cart, when he took the whip and drove it up to the barn, leaving me in the meantime at work in the field. When unloaded he returned with the empty cart, upon which we pitched a ton, making in all three tons between us that afternoon and one ton and one-half as his part of the work. It was a hot afternoon, and I observed what I had before seen when he used muscular exertion, he sweat more profusely than most men; it literally poured off of him like rain.

"When I met him the next morning, said he: 'John Taylor, I have slept sounder and feel in better health than usual. How I wish I could only live as you do. A farmer's life is the most rational mode of existence; good food, home raised, with healthful work for the day and sound sleep for the night. It gives a man a clear head, a large heart and strong hands.'"

AGRICULTURAL PROGRESS.—That agriculture is making rapid progress there can be no doubt, and yet it is not so extremely far ahead of the agriculture of olden times as might be supposed. The truth is there was a great falling back, and hence much of the progress made has only gone as a regain of that which was lost. Rome had writers of agricultural literature who offered suggestions which, though more than two thousand years old, may still be heeded with profit by practical farmers. The advantages of thorough over shiftless cultivation is especially insisted on by them, while the advisability of early planting, tilling, harvesting, etc., is forcibly commended. The Northern barbarians who overran and subjugated Rome, cared nothing for improving agriculture, but the Saracens came and took possession of most of Southern Europe, introducing irrigation and kindred arts from Northern Africa. They made the Spanish peninsular flourish as it had never done till then. The revenue collected by these Mohammedans each year in Spain, is computed by historians to have been equal to $600,000,000 of the money of our times—a sum which indicates a thrift in cultivation as well as manufactures, unknown to their modern successors.

So a thousand or more years ago the art of agriculture was by no means badly understood. The tools employed may have been inferior to the tools of the present day, but all the writings left us show conclusively that this is more than need be said of the knowledge necessary to grow crops of large yield. Could those old Saracens have had our ploughs, our harrows, our grain drills, our harvesting machines, and the many minor tools we use, they would doubtless have approached, if not equalled, our averages per acre.—Mobile Register.

BEE CULTURE.—There are few people who have not kept bees that are aware of how profitable a few colonies of bees—especially the imported strains of Italians—can be made. Many an invalid who finds time hanging heavily on his (or her) hands could find great comfort in having a few cobnles of Italian bees in improved hives, watching their comings and goings, laden with the precious freight. It opens up a large study, when it is profitable, in many localties very profitable. In this article, necessarily short, I shall not give any figures as to the amount of profit one can feel assured of making every season. Most people are used to the common black bee, and though the habits of bees as a general thing are about the same, we have found that the Italian is not only more prolific but far gentler to handle. Almost any one can take these bees in their hand without being stung. They fly further after stores, fly faster and return oftener than the blacks. Some writer has said that the best trap for the worms and moths that destroy bees is a teacup full of Italian bees. I have never seen a colony—even very weak—injured by moths or worms. A person who has never seen or owned a pure colony of Italian bees, and judges bee culture by some standard in which the black bees figured has no idea whatever of the ease and pleasure of running an apiary of Italians. The trouble generally has been in obtaining a pure strain of Italian bees. Many queen rearers exist, and I'm sorry to say that some of them rear queens which, after being impregnated by a black drone (which renders that queen's progeny half bloods or hybrids,) are advertised and sold for a purely mated mother. After awhile the purchaser finds that he can not get in ten feet of his bees for their stinging him. So much for hybrids or crosses between the Italian and black honey bees.—New York Herald.

SHEEP.—The crying need of American agriculture to-day is a more general incorporation of the sheep into the farming economy. More prolific than horses or cattle, as well as more tractable, subsisting on scantier herbage and requiring less supervision, it claims the additional advantage of "paying for its raising" in annual instalments of marketable fleece pending its growth to maturity. It is more readily transferred from one inclosure to another, and is easily restrained by fences which would prove no barrier against the encroachment of other farm stock. Its light tread and love of repose warrant its access to fields and pastures where the tramping of cattle and the tearing of hogs would not be tolerated. It wastes less food in proportion to the quantity consumed, and will hunt and utilize much that would otherwise be lost to the farmer. Yielding a return in both fleece and flesh, it furnishes its owner with the double advantage of catching a good market for his product, requiring less water and disposed to work for its food. It is without a peer when summer's drouth taxes the farmer's resources for enabling his live stock to maintain an average of thirst and flesh. All that can be said in behalf of feeding live stock on the farm, as distinguished from the soil impoverishing policy of placing the raw grain and grass upon the market, will be found to apply with double emphasis to the farm that carries as a part of its outfit one or more sheep per acre. No, the animal returns more fertility to soil in proportion to the amount exacted for its support, while none equals it in the evenness with which the droppings are distributed. Notwithstanding the evident advantages an increase in sheep culture brings the agriculture of a country generally, and especially inuring to the benefit of such farmers as incorporate it into their system, the fact is apparent that sheep are not so numerous or so evenly distributed as they should be.—Breeder's Gazette.

PREPARING PEACH STONES.—Several have asked how to prepare peach stones for planting. They are probably aware, that when the stones are kept dry all winter and then planted in spring, very few, if any, will germinate. In nurseries, the stones are not allowed to get very dry, but they are stratified or bedded just before winter sets in. The usual manner is, to mark out the limits of the bed and spread the stones over it to the depth of two or three inches; the stones are then spaded in as if turning under a dressing of manure. By this operation they are distributed through and well mixed with the soil, where they are left to freeze and thaw all winter. This treatment causes the halves of the stone to separate and the pressure within of the swelling seed can push them apart. This may be effected by other methods than that of spading in. The stones are sometimes spread upon the ground and covered with spent tan-bark or sawdust to the depth of three to five inches, and thus exposed to the weather. In spring, when the ground is ready to plant, the stones that have been spaded in are separated by throwing the soil of the bed upon a riddle, such as is used by masons; the earth falls through while the stones are left upon the riddle. Those that have been under tan or sawdust are more easily recovered at planting time.—American Agriculturist.

JOHNSON GRASS HAY.—The editor of the Southern Live Stock Journal learns from a reliable party, that a gentleman in Texas, last year raised 300 tons of Johnson grass hay from 60 acres of land, which he is selling at $25 per ton. The gentleman has a Dederick hay press and is fixed up with all the conveniences for handling hay. He will probably clear from $5,000 to $6,000 on his hay crop, besides using a large amount of the hay on his farm, feeding to stock.

Said editor is further informed from a reliable source, that there is another gentleman in the same State, who is largely engaged in raising Johnson grass hay for market. He is receiving $35 per ton for his hay. As yet the average farmer is afraid to sow Johnson grass for fear it will ruin his farm. It may ruin it so far as cultivation is concerned, but what if it does? The hay harvested each year, sold, and fed to stock upon the farm, will, if rightly managed, insure a fortune. Johnson grass is no "humbug." Johnson grass is worthy of all the good words that have been spoken in its favor. It's a God-send to our beautiful Southland, and time will prove it. Thousands of acres will be seeded to Johnson grass this spring in the Gulf States."

CUTWORM PREVENTIVE.—A lady writes to the Fruit Recorder: "I have tried with success your grub preventive for strawberries. The recipe is one-half pint of salt and one ounce of copperas to three-fourths of a pail of water. I dipped my strawberry plants, some two hundred or three hundred, in it before setting, and only lost three plants out of the lot. I was very much troubled with cutworms destroying everything that I set out, as well as the small white maggot, at the roots of cabbage and cauliflower plants, and had a great deal of inquiry made by other people, what to do, to keep the worms from destroying their tomato and other plants. As I was selling a good many such plants I kept a pail of the solution handy, when I took them up from the seed bed, immersed them in it. Do not know of a single plant being eaten by cutworms, and only three or four cauliflowers were troubled with the maggot, but that did not prevent the ravages of the green cabbage worm the later in the season; pepper applied frequently I think would. I saw hot water recommended and tried it, but spoiled my cauliflowers. Did not use solution quite as strong for other plants as strawberries."

BEST SEED.—A Connecticut farmer says that the butt ends of potatoes and the kernels of corn from the butt ends of the ears, each produced crops that were materially better than where the opposite course was pursued. In the case of potatoes the stalks from the butt end were much the larger and more forward at the first hoeing. The increase in corn was some twenty per cent, in favor of the butt end kernels.

PRUNING.—Pruning may be performed at any time, but where there are only a small number of trees to be pruned for it is preferable to delay it until February. Give the orchard a shallow and careful ploughing, not disturbing the roots. Dig under a liberal top-dressing of fertilizers equal to the spread of the branches of the trees.

Household.

BEEF A LA MAUEDOINE.—Cut some rump steak in slices a little more than half an inch thick, trim them all to the same size in the shape of cutlets and lard them thickly on one side with fine lardoons of bacon fat. Lay them out, the larded side uppermost, into a flat pan and put into it as much highly flavored rich stock or gravy as will come up to the grenadins without covering them. Cover the pan and place it in the oven to braise gently for an hour. Then remove the cover, baste the grenadins with the gravy and let them remain uncovered in the oven till the larding has taken color; then they are ready. Take equal quantities of carrots and turnips cut into the shape of olives, also equal quantities of tinned peas, of harricot beans, of asparagus points (tinned) and of small sprigs of broccoli. Boil all these vegetables in salted water, then melt a piece of butter in a sauce-pan, add a tablespoonful of flour, stir in sufficient milk to make a sauce, add pepper, salt and a little grated nutmeg. Put all the vegetables into this sauce, of which there should be just enough to make them hold together. Toss them gently in it to make them quite hot. Lay them in the middle of a dish, round them dispose the grenadins in a circle, and, having removed the superfluous fat from their gravy, pour this round the grenadins and serve.

SPLIT PEA SOUP.—Soak two quarts of split peas over night, and put them on to boil early in the morning, with one pound of salt pork washed clean, one pound of lean fresh beef, and six quarts of cold water. The meat can be cut into inch-square pieces. Cover the pot, and when it boils stir it occasionally, as the peas will settle to the bottom, and may scorch and spoil the soup. Remove all scum that rises. Let it boil slowly for three or four hours on the back part of the stove. When nearly ready to serve, season with a little salt, pepper, and a tablespoonful of celery seeds. Cut some wheat bread into bits like dice and fry in pork fat. Put into the tureen and serve very hot. If preferred, the meat can be strained out through a sieve and served separately. Pea soup should be eaten very hot, as it thickens rapidly when cooling. An onion, carrot and turnip sliced into the soup, when first put on to boil, will add to its flavor, also celery tops can be used instead of the seed.—Country Gentleman.

COLD CHICKEN.—The meat of large fowls, however dark in color and however tough, may be made tender by gentle simmering in a stew-pan over the fire in the usual way, or, better still, in the oven. For the latter cut the fowl into joints, place them in a deep pie dish, with enough cold water to completely cover them, place the dish on the bottom shelf of the oven, which should not be too hot, and let it remain until sufficiently tender to draw out the bones; watch it in order to add more water as the first reduces. It must be kept quite under water all the time, or it would dry up and become hard and brown; at the same time it does not do to put it in too much water at first, as it would draw the goodness from the meat. It will probably take about an hour and a half to do, and, prepared in this way, it will be ready to use for risoles, croquets, curry or mince, taken care to chop up a little fat streaky bacon with it. The liquor in which it has been cooked will be very good to moisten it as required, or it may be added to the stock pot.

OLD TIME PORK AND BEANS.—Take two pounds of moderately lean side pork, to two quarts of marrow fat or other beans. Put the beans to soak over night. In the morning after breakfast scald and scrape the rind of the pork and put on to boil an hour before putting in the beans. Set the beans to boil in a separate pot, in half-warm water. If the water used is of hard lime-stone use a teaspoonful of soda to the first water. After boiling a short time, drain through a colander and put on fresh water and let boil until quite tender. Then add the pork to the beans and let simmer until nearly as stiff as mashed potatoes. Then put into a baking dish; score the pork and place in the centre; brown in the oven one hour. Great care should be taken not to let the beans scorch when they are boiling.

ROYAL CORN BREAD.—Make a pint of batter of two-thirds nice corn meal and one-third coarse flour stirred in water; let it stand in a warm place until it ferments well; then add warm water, two or three tablespoonfuls of molasses, a teaspoonful of salt and a teaspoonful of soda, (or enough to correct the acidity) then thicken with corn meal and coarse flour, in the same proportion as at first, making the batter about the same consistency for griddle cakes; oil your baking dish and fill about half full, always have about a pint of the batter to start with again. Place the loaf in a steamer and steam it two hours for a two quart loaf, and bake it in the oven about thirty minutes, to brown it. The same recipe may be used for griddle cakes.

CABBAGE.—A nice way to prepare cabbage for immediate use is to cut enough into fine shreds to fill a quart dish; pepper and salt to taste; sprinkle over it a teaspoonful of sugar; into two-thirds of a pint of vinegar put a teaspoonful of butter, and let it boil; then pour over the prepared cabbage; cover tightly and send to the table; or prepare the cabbage as above, only take half a pint of cream and add to it three tablespoonfuls of vinegar and pour over it; do not heat the cream.

A GOOD MAYONNAISE DRESSING.—Put the yolks of two eggs in a deep dish with a little salt and white pepper; into these stir briskly some olive oil, which must be added very gradually and alternated every little while with a few spoonfuls of vinegar. The dressing should have an agreeable flavor, and a rather stiff consistency. Salad oil should be kept well corked in a dry cool place, and always in the dark.

CAKE MAKING.—In making cakes be careful to observe the following simple rules: Beat them up with your hand, not with a spoon; always dry your flour; always clean your currants and sultana raisins in flour, not in water; beat up eggs for ten minutes before adding them to the other ingredients; when the cakes are taken from the oven, turn them out of the tin and stand them outside the warm tin.

PLAIN SPICED CAKES.—Two eggs, one cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of butter, one cupful of raisins, after being seeded and chopped; one-half cupful of buttermilk, one teaspoonful of soda, one heaping teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful of cloves, one-third of a nutmeg, and three small cupfuls of flour.

Scientific.

ANATOMY OF AN EARTHWORM.—The body of a large worm consists of one or two hundred almost cylyndrical rings or segments, each furnished with minute bristles, and is endowed with a well developed muscular system. The mouth is provided with a little projection or lip, capable of taking hold of things and of sneking. Internally, a strong pharynx, corresponding, according to Perrier, with the protrusile trunk or proboscis of other annelids, and which is pushed forward when the animal eats, is situated behind the mouth. The pharynx leads into the œsophagus, on each side of the lower part of which are three pairs of large glands, which secrete a surprising amount of carbonate of lime. They are unlike anything that is known in any other animal, and their use is largely a matter of speculation. Mr. Darwin thinks they are partly excretions of the excess of lime contained in the leaves which the animal eats, and that they otherwise aid digestion by affording a neutralizer against the acids of its food. In most of the species the œsophagus is enlarged into a cup in front of the gizzard. The latter organ is lined with a smooth, thick, chitinous membrane, and is surrounded by weak longitudinal but powerful transverse muscles. Grains of sand and small stones from one-twentieth to a little more than one-tenth of an inch in diameter may be found in the gizzard and intestines, and are supposed to serve, like millstones, to triturate the food. The gizzard opens into the intestine, which presents a peculiarly remarkable longitudinal involution of the walls, by which an extensive absorbent surface is well developed. Breathing is done by the skin, without special respiratory organs. The nervous system is fairly developed, with two almost confluent cerebral ganglia situated near the anterior end. Worms have no eyes, and are measurably indifferent to light; yet they can distinguished night from day, and are thickly affected by a strong light, and after some time by a moderate light shining continuously upon them. They do not much mind a moderate radiant heat, but are sensitive to cold. They have no sense of hearing, but are extremely sensitive to vibrations in any solid object. Worms in pots, which had paid no attention to the sound of a piano, when placed on the piano instantly drew into their holes when the notes were struck. Their whole body is sensitive to contact, as of a puff of air. Their sense of smell is feeble, but responds fairly well to the odor of the cabbage and onion or whatever they like, as was shown to Mr. Darwin by some very interesting experiments. They are omnivorous, and swallow enormous quantities of earth, out of which they extract any digestible matter which it may contain, consume decayed and fresh leaves and vegetable matter, and raw, roasted and decayed meat, but like raw fat best.—Popular Science Monthly.

OXYGEN.—The highest temperatures are obtained by combustion—that is, by the combination of other bodies with oxygen. Since oxygen is continually inhaled and consumed by animals during life, we are obliged to consider this as the source of heat and force. We have here a problem which is open to discussion, namely, whether the energy liberated by the combustion was originally contained in the oxygen or in the other substances. It appears as if the latter assumption was generally accepted; at least, statements are often met with, such as, for instance, that coal contains the heat of the sun which has been stored up during thousands of years. Although we can not, at present, with the means at our disposal, definitely solve this problem, it can at least be shown that the statement has little in its favor. The decomposition of carbonic acid by the influence of the light and heat of the sun is effected in such a manner that the carbon is employed in the formation of the compounds of which the plant is built up, while the oxygen escapes into the atmosphere. Now, we know that solids contain the least energy, because it must be supplied to them in the form of heat in order to convert them into the liquid or gaseous state; while, on the contrary, heat must be withdrawn from gases to condense them to liquids or solids. Oxygen is one of the most permanent gases, and must therefore possess an enormous amount of energy; while carbon, on the other hand, being one of the most difficultly diffusible and volatile bodies, can only contain a little energy. This makes it extremely probable that the force of the sun, taken up by the plants, is not stored in their bodies, but in the free oxygen of the atmosphere. Hence the latter is to be considered as the inexhaustible source of power on which man and animals draw, and in the carbon we possess a valuable aid for making this energy, contained in the oxygen, available.—Edmund Drechsel, in Popular Science Monthly.

PRECIOUS OPAL.—Since the time Pliny accurately described his opalus, to the present day, this handsome mineral has been esteemed a gem, though not always assigned the same rank; for fashion in its capricious vagaries, displaced and reinstate it in favor at irregular intervals. Its innate beauty, so happily charactorized in the lines,

"Milky opals that gleam and shine Like sullen fires through a pallid mine," coupled with the fact that it is perhaps the only stone really defying imitation, has enabled it to eventually hold its own. The high rank awarded it in ancient times was undoubtedly larger due to the comparative ease with which it could be worked, and also to the facts that unlike all the precious stones much of its beauty was revealed and available without any labor. The strange popular belief of modern days that opal is an unlucky stone to the wearer, appears to be directly traceable to Sir Walter Scott's Romance of "Anna of Geirstein." In its usual occurrence in seams or veins in porphyry and igneous rocks, it is plainly an infiltration of gelatinous silica (silica in the colloid state), often mixed with considerable crystalloid silica, and retaining more or less of the original combined water. Indeed, opal proper seems, as a rule, to contain more water than the other varieties. Until within the past few years the greater part of the material for commerce has been of Hungarian and Mexican origin, but a new source of supply has been discovered in Queensland. In the variety from this locality, which may in some respects be considered unique, the usual fiery reflections are displaced partly or even entirely by the most splendent metallic hues—greens and blues of every conceivable shade—the individual colors in some instances being arranged in more or less distinctly defined bands or zones or again imperceptibly melting into each other and vying with the plumage of humming birds in magnificence. Clearly the old descriptions will need enlarging to envy this latest addition to the numerous forms of silica.—F. W. Stanbner.

Christian Advocate.

"Extravaganza"—Where?

Rev. Christian Keener's article in the last Advocate, having the above quoted word as a part of its title, is very much open to criticism, and as he is so merciless in his attack upon others, he cannot object to a review of his own article.

I would call attention first to its style. The English language is very remarkable for its flexibility, but it has its rules of composition nevertheless, and if a writer desires respectability as such he must show some respect for these rules. Brother Keener seems either not to know or else not to care about them. Examples: "The idea seems to be that the negro, the brother in black, who has been the disturbing cause of the conscience of Christendom," etc. How the negro or anything else could be "the disturbing cause of the conscience of Christendom" it is hard to see, certainly this is "new light." Again: "It is a sentimental use of language which ignores the real difference between the races, and vital to the fundamental basis of society." What is "vital to the fundamental basis of society?" Once more: "Any basis of real harmony between two races which God has made so different must be based not on sentimental differences," etc. How will you "base" a "basis?"

But, leaving the style, let us pass on to the spirit of the article. Dr. Haygood and other criticizers are men of ripe experience and scholarship, and recognized leaders in the church, and to insinuate that such men have developed "new leads of thought" merely as a skillful method of securing money, and to characterize their deliverences by such disrespectful terms as "sentimental" and "simple nonsence," is very unbecoming and to be deplored. Such a spirit is more like that of one familiar with the hustings than of him who has been commissioned to teach men to look not upon their own things but also on the things of others."

The style and spirit of the article are both bad: Now let us look at its philosophy. It is simply this; that there is a difference between one's dress and his skin, and to speak of "our brother in black," when we mean his skin, is to mislead by the sentimental use of language. And hence he charges upon Dr. Haygood a doctrine, that is vitiative of truth and detrimental to the interest of society. Now I undertake to say that Dr. Haygood believes as much as does Brother Keener that the difference between the negro and the white man is more than skin deep. He nowhere intimates in his book that there is not a distinction between the two races. Farther than this the Doctor defends the color-line principle of the South. If there is any thing misleading about the book, it is the prejudice engendered by the title, and I am disposed to think that men have allowed prejudice to bias their judgment of the book. But why that prejudice? Has not Bro. K. recognized the negro as a brother? And if a brother, being "of one blood," and having the same spiritual susceptibility, is there any harm in adding the other terms of the title?

There is an untimeliness about the article. The days were when we had to vindicate ourselves, and we were able to do it, and did do it. The Cape May commission has been held, fraternal messages have been interchanged, the great Ecumenical is over, and we are moving on. The North, with very few exceptions, seems devoted to the cause of peace. The General Conference is near at hand, and new Bishops are to be chosen. It seems out of place to tilt at men of honored names just at this juncture. We are talking about a great Extension Society, and about helping the Southern Colored Church. In the same paper in which Brother Keener's article is published is a letter from Atlanta, Georgia, saying that Bishop Holsey had been preaching and lecturing to the white Methodists of Atlanta, with Gov. Colquitt, Judge Jackson and Dr. Haygood on the platform, and that they were going to help the negroes there purchase a seven thousand dollar brick church. And still we must not say "our Brother in Black!"

Truly there is "Extravaganza" somewhere—but where?

J. W. MEDLOCK.

VIENNA, La., Feb. 28, 1882.

This Cold World.

I have been anxious for some time to contradict the idea which some people entertain, that this is a cold and friendless world; but feeling my incompetency to write much on the subject, I will pay a feeble tribute of gratitude to the good and philanthropic citizens of Madison and Hinds counties. Two years ago, by the decree of unerring Providence, I was forced to surrender the dearest idol this earth contained, the joy of my heart, the very light of my existence. Thus left alone, as I felt, no relation near me, with seven little children, the youngest three months old, to provide for, and homeless, with only a small amount of money, which his industry and economy had accumulated, I feel that I have fully tested the philanthropic merits of this community. I don't think that Mrs. Garfield, comparatively speaking, received more sympathy than I did in my bereavement. Of course my grief was irrelievable; but it was greatly ameliorated by the kindness of surrounding friends, who soon proved that they were willing to do all that was available for our relief. My children were treated with the utmost kindness and respect, and every merchant in my acquaintance seemed to deem it his duty to let me have goods at the lowest possible figures. Nor has time made much change in the feelings of these good people. Not longer ago than last Christmas eve, a gentleman of our little village, seeing one of my little boys on the street, kindly touched him on the shoulder and asked him if Santa Claus was coming to his house. The answer being in the negative, the gentleman ordered some of the nicest candies for the little orphan. Thus the hearts of the little ones were made glad, and saved the disappointment of finding empty stockings on Christmas morning. Another instance of the benevolence of our country can be told as follows. It was collection day at our little country church, and the steward in his rounds of duties, instead of accepting the widows pittance whispered kindly "I'll pay that for you." This circumstance and others too numerous to mention, can never be erased from memory's tablet. And here I must express my heart-felt thanks to the unknown friend, who has so unexpectedly made me the recipient of the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. May heavens choicest blessings ever attend them. What could be more acceptable, as the cold days of Autumn approach, than enough jeans to clothe a half dozen boys for the Winter, or a barrel of flour when your store-room had been robbed of all the provissions you had? I can never call this a cold world, while under the genial influence of such charitable people. Words are inadequate nor shall I attempt to express the debt of gratitude I owe to one whose untiring energy, and ceaseless endeavors to promote my welfare, hold too sacred a place in my heart to be made public. But the spirit of my departed dear one, will whisper to him all his sorrying widow's thanks and if the companion of his bosom should ever be left to pass the ordeal that I have gone through, the greatest boon that I can ask for her is that she may find such a benefactor as I have found in her true and noble husband.

Flower Verses.

As spring is coming, and, with its return, the wealth of fragrance, beauty and bloom that characterizes this season, I wish to give the readers of the ADVOCATE a plan by which each flower may speak a new language to the devout heart—the true "language of flowers."

Last spring I selected a verse from the Bible for all my flowers, such as I deemed most appropriate. Some of these sweet gems of nature teach lessons of humility, others of purity, shortness of life, prayer, etc., and I tried to arrange the verses, as well as I could, according to the idea each indicated. I wrote, as an introduction to my "Flower Verses," a selection from Canticles' "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out."

"As the jonquil is one of the first to blood in early spring, I chose for it: "Oh, satisfy us early with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days."—Psalms xc, 14.

The spirea is so pure and white that for it I selected: "Let thy garments be always white."—Ecclesiastes ix, 8.

For the hyacinth I selected a verse from the Psalms, on humility.

For the yellow jessamine: "The king's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold."—Psalms xlv, 13.

For the sweet violet, that fills the air with such rare perfume, no verse seemed more appropriate than this: "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer."—Psalms xix, 14.

The snow-ball, you know, first comes as a little green ball, which keeps growing and getting whiter, until it is one perfect mass of snowy white, so I chose for it: "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."—II Peter III, 18.

Of course the verse for the rose was about the rose of Sharon, and for the lily: "Consider the lilies," etc.

The pansy has a humility verse, and the poppy one on the shortness of life.

The morning glory: "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning I will direct my prayer unto thee, and look up."—Psalms v, 3.

I had just one of the old-fashioned sunflower plants in my garden, and every day the round yellow disks would follow the sun from east to west and for it I selected: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help."—Psalms cxxi, 1.

My sweet white evening glory flowers had for their lesson: "Let my prayer be set before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice."—Psalms cxli, 2.

For the cape jessamine (my favorite flower,) a beautiful selection about purity, and another for the tube rose.

As the chrysanthemum is one of the last flowers that brighten up the dying glory of the year I chose for it: "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and thy paths drop fatness."—Psalms xlv, 11.

I have given only a few selections, but enough to give some one a desire to "go and do likewise," I hope. I liked the plan so well that I wanted to share it with others. It will do us good to have verses for all our flowers; then they will indeed help us to "look through nature up to nature's God."

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health;" and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value; and of universal application and use. This work is altered in concluding more that has been proved by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of practising anxiety, than any other that has ever been prescribed to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive to many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

ATLANTA, March 7.—One of the largest and most enthusiastic temperance meetings ever held in Georgia convened at the First Methodist Church to-night. The first speaker was Wm. E. Dodge, of New York, president of the National Temperance Association, who made a strong and brilliant effort. He was introduced by Gov. Colquitt. Speeches were also made by Gov. Colquitt, Hon. John Stearns, of New York, and Judge Geo. M. Lester. All the speeches were for prohibition, and Judge Lester, and old man, said that he expected to live to see the day when a dram-seller would not get a license in Georgia. It is stated on good authority that Gov. Colquit will make the race for Congressman at large as the temperance candidate. About two-thirds of the counties in this State now have local option laws, and the temperance sentiment is growing among the people.

MEMPHIS, March 7.—Capt. Ed. Postal, of the steamer Hard Cash, which arrived this morning, reports that the back water from the Mississippi river extends up the White river to Clarendon, Ark., a distance of 135 miles from its mouth, and the entire country intervening is under water, which is two feet higher than was ever known before. Great loss of stock and damage to farming interests has occurred throughout the White river bottoms. The river here continues stationary.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 7.—Work was started by the Adams Cotton Factory yesterday afternoon. This is the first cotton factory venture in this city and caused great enthusiasm. The capacity of the mill will be about 1500 bales of cotton per annum.

MOBILE, March 7.—At the municipal election yesterday, the Straight Democratic ticket was successful. The Democrats elected the Mayor, municipal board, and probably tax collector.

JACKSON, Miss., March 8.—The Governor has made the following appointments to-day, which were confirmed by the Legislature: Judge of the Supreme Court, H. H. Chalmers; Circuit Judges—Buchanan, Featherstone, Rhane, Tuble, Arnold, Terrall, Muyers, Calhoun, Cowan and North; Chancellor, J. G. Hall. Dr. T. J. Mitchell was reappointed Superintendent of the Lunatic Asylum, and Dr. Wirt Johnston Secretary of the State Board of Health. E. G. Wallace was elected Commissioner of Emigration.

WASHINGTON, March, 8.—Senator George, of Misaissippi, has brought in a bill to revise the grant of lands made to the State of Mississippi to aid in constructing a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico.

MEMPHIS, March 8.—E. H. Moore, an attorney, residing at Rosedale, the county seat of Bolivar county, Mississippi, was a passenger on the steamer Dem Adams, which arrived last midnight. He reports breaks in Hushpuckana and Lake Charles levees, which occurred Monday night. The Hushpuckana is the largest levee in Mississippi, and these breaks submerge the entire county of Bolivar. At Rosedale the water is ten feet deep in all the dwellings. Of its 300 inhabitants only three families yet remain, and they are living in the garrets of their houses. All the others have fled and sought safety elsewhere. A portion of the levee immediately in front of Rosedale is crowded with negroes, mules and cattle. The negroes number about five hundred, have no shelter and are existing on the cattle which they kill. Their condition is terrible, exposed as they have been for the past two days to the cold, drenching showers that have fallen. Mules, cattle and other stock have been drowned by hundreds, and are hourly dying of starvation.

CHICAGO, March 9.—A special dispatch from Little Rock, says: Gov. Churchill was found this morning in his private office examining letters which had been received from sufferers by the recent floods, and dictating dispatches in response to telegrams for immediate aid. The extent of the disaster can hardly be measured, he said, in answer to an inquiry, and I feel greatly depressed over the situation. I received this morning a number of letters from prominent men in the overflowed districts in Arkansas, who draw gloomy and graphic pictures of the death and suffering around them. I am also in receipt of numerous telegrams every day appealing for aid. The situation is appalling. Ashley county reports 1000 persons on the verge of starvation, and Chicot and Desha have each as many if not more. Cross, Crittenden, Mississippi, Lee, St. Francis, Monroe and Phillips counties have thousands of sufferers in destitute circumstances. I should judge that they are nearly, if not fully, 15,000 persons needing aid in the State to-day. They are tenants and farmers of small means, who have lost their all by the overflow: houses, farming implements, stocks, everything has been swallowed up in the floods.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, March 9.—Mr. Farley presented and had read a memorial from citizens of California, reciting the arrest and imprisonment by the British Government, without just cause, of Daniel McSweeny, a citizen of the United States and late a resident of California, while he was peaceably sojourning in England. He also submitted a resolution narrating the alleged facts and instructing the Secretary of State to ascertain the cause for imprisonment and to report as early a day as possible. Adopted without objection. The calendar was taken up and the Senate bill for a commission on the subject of alcoholic liquor traffic was further debated. Pending amendment directing that not more than three of five members of the commission shall be of the same political party, was agreed to. Mr. Bayard moved to require that no more than three of them shall be prohibitionists. Agreed to. Discussion followed upon the amendments offered and advocated by Messrs. Blair, Morgan and Ingalls. Pending action the morning hour expired. The Chinese bill was taken up and Mr. Hawley enumerated his objection to it. Mr. Hawley spoke briefly, but after him came Mr. Jones, of Nevada, who delivered a long and carefully prepared speech in favor of the bill. Mr. Edmunds closed the debate. A vote was then taken and the bill passed. The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to the Chinese." Mr. Hoar suggested that the word "execute" should read "violate." Adjourned.

BAYOU SARA, La., March 10.—The levee that broke in Pointe Coupee was the levee just completed by O'Malley, and was protected by a protection levee in front of the old Col. Scott place, over what is known as the lake. Some parties cut the protection levee in order to let the water in gradually on the new levee, but it came in with more force than was anticipated, and the levee being soft, gave way. The break is now about one thousand feet and widening every hour. Major Brown, State Engineer visited the scene of disaster yesterday and was interviewed by your reporter last night. He is of the opinion that it is useless to attempt to close it. This will flood every place on False river from Waterloo to the Vincent plantation, a distance of about sixteen miles, ten places, causing a loss of about two thousand hogsheads of sugar, besides great loss of stock and other property. The chances are that all of the Grosse Tete country will go under. At last accounts the water was on a level with their levee, and this sudden increase will certainly go over.

MEMPHIS, March 10.—Passengers from below report a break in the levee, one and one-half miles above Friar's Point, Miss. The break occured yesterday and although Friar's Point will be overflowed from the break, yet, occurring where it did, the town will not suffer by the river washing through, as at Austin.

WASHINGTON, March 10.—Senator Hill, of Georgia, is quite comfortable to-day and doing well, notwithstanding a rumor that he was dead, which got afloat early in the day.

WASHINGTON, March 11.—In reply to a request from Gov. McEnery, the Secretary of War ordered 100,000 rations to be delivered to Commissioners at New Orleans for the sufferers by floods in Louisiana.

Senator Hill, of Georgia, has passed a comfortable day, and is reported as feeling much better to-night.

RALEIGH, N. C., March 11.—Information has been received here that the Mormons have made lodgment near Kings Mountain, in this State. Numbers of country people are flocking to hear them, and they have made about 50 converts at that point.

MERIDIAN, Miss., March 12.—Gary & Sons' compress and 300 bales of cotton, and Parker & Hoffer's foundry were burned last night. The loss on the compress is $18,000, insurance $10,000. The cotton was not insured. Parker & Hoffer's loss is $8000, no insurance.

JACKSON, March 13.—Reports from the overflowed districts, received to-day by Gov. Lowry, are most unfavorable and show great distress and suffering. The Governor leaves to-morrow for the scene of trouble and to render all aid possible. Col. Hemingway, now at Memphis, is making every effort to relieve the sufferers in that section.

MEMPHIS, March 13.—The river here continues to decline slowly, and has fallen about five inches from the highest point this season. Capt. J. S. Load, another army officer, who has been investigating the condition of affairs in the overflowed regions between Cairo, Ill., and this city, arrived this morning. In an interview with your correspondent this afternoon Capt. Load, said, never in the memory of the oldest inhabitant has been such an extreme, unexpected and unseasonable overflow as is now devastating the country through which he had just passed. New Madrid and Pemiscot counties, Missouri, are almost entirely submerged. In Pemiscot county there are not less than 1,200 persons rendered entirely destitute.

FORDOCHE, La., March 13.—The Grosse Tete and Fordoche levees still stand, although the water is 25 inches higher than ever known and from 6 to 8 inches above the original lines. Over 500 men are out piling earth against the revetment of pickets on the cap of the 30 miles of levees. There are several weak places, but the weather is clear. The people are working cheerfully. The water is temporarily at a stand, and the prospects are brighter now than any time during the past week. The levee company organization is perfect, and the local laws are enforced so as to bring out every man. The company has the aid of the New Orleans Pacific force and of the steamer Sinsie, Capt. Pruyn, which traverses the front, carrying men and the material to weak places. The fascining of the Colomb crevasse will prevent crevasses here.

VICKSBURG, March 13.—The Hard Times, Point Pleasant, Buckner's and Woodburn, levees all gave way this morning.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN, March 7.—The Prussian Chamber of Deputies to-day voted the sum required for the establishment of the Prussian legation at the vatican. The Liberals opposed the measdre.

HAMBURG, March 7.—During the months of January and February 12,655 emigrants left here for the United States.

ROME, March 9.—It is announced that Rev. Cinolla, ex-Canon of St. Peter's Cathedral, which shortly assume direction of a new paper, entitled Labaro, for the publication of which capital has been supplied by Anglican dissenters in Italy. The principle of the paper will be for the furtherance of Court Cavour's idea of a free church in a free State.

CITY OF MEXICO, March 11.—The Mexican press are combining in denunciation of the importation of negro labor, for employment on the branch of the Mexican Central Railroad from Tampico to San Luis Potosi. The government is asked to insist on the employment of native labor.

The first death from yellow fever this season occurred in Vera Cruz yesterday.

VIENNA, March 12.—After the blowing up of Fort Dragulia the Austrians began their return toward Risano. The Triviscians followed and attacked them near Jankow. A severe battle ensued, the insurgents taking Jankow by a storm.

At the council of Austrian and Hungarian Ministers to-day, Conni Bylandt Rheydt, Minister of War of the Empire, announced the complete Austrian occupation of Criverscie, and said he anticipated the speedy pacification of Herzegovinia.

LONDON, March 13.—The Daily News' special correspondent at Killarney says he believes matters are rapidly mending in Ireland. Numbers of tenants, he says, are coming forward to claim the advantages of the land act. A farmer, named Connell, and his wife were shot in the legs at Fracle, County Clare, Saturday, and it is expected they will die. This case is exactly similar to the shooting of Farmer Moroney, a fortnight ago, when an armed party attacked his house and shot him through the legs, stabbed one of his sons and shot another son.

NATCHEZ, JACKSON & COLUMBUS RAILROAD.—Grading on the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railroad is now being carried on about five or six miles from Jackson. The distance from Natchez to Jackson is about one hundred miles, sixty miles of the road has been completed. Of the remaining forty miles, the grading has been finished to within twelve miles of Jackson, and will be completed in three months. Bridge timber, cross-ties etc., have been obtained and the iron necessary to lay the track from the present terminus. (Bayou Pierre) to Jackson is at Natchez and the road will probably be complete and ready for through trains between those two points in about six months.

CHOOSING A LIFE-PARTNER.—Never marry because the person has a handsome face or a well turned figure; for we soon become insensible to angelic forms and faces. If the countenance has life and intelligence, if the walk is indicative of firmness, the carriage modest, and the whole apperance proves the possesser to have mind, heart and soul, that person is worth all the simpering, mincing, affected ones that came up to the marriage altar, with nothing but their good looks to commend them. If the admired one is rich in real estate, bank stock or railroad shares, do not let that prove an insurmountable objection; but if poor like yourself, so much the better.

There is nothing like a young couple, about the age of twenty-two, starting in life with fond hearts, clear heads, easy consciences, and empty pockets. You have something to hope for, to work for, to live for! Your early struggles will only bind your hearts closer together.

Fidelity, good humor and complacency of temper, outlive all the charms of a fine face, and make the decay of it invisible.

Mr. Palmer F. Dale, living near Savannah, Ga., says: "Myself and family have always, since living in this locality, been troubled with malarial disorders. Hearing that Brown's Iron Bitters were a sure preventive, we have used it sparingly, and as a result none of us have since been sick."

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

MARCH.

The stormy March is come at last,
With wind and cloud and changing skies;
I hear the rushing of the blast,
That through the snowy valley flies.

Ah, passing few are they who speak,
Wild, stormy month, in praise of thee;
Yet, though thy winds are loud and bleak,
Thou art a welcome month to me,

For thou to northern lands again
The glad and glorious sun dost bring,
And thou hast joined the gentle train,
And wear'st the gentle name of spring.

And in thy reign of blast and storm
Smiles many a long, bright, sunny day,
When the changed winds are soft and warm,
And heaven puts on the blue of May.

Then sing aloud the gushing rills,
From winter's durance just set free,
And brightly leaping down the hills,
Begin their journey to the sea.

The year's departing beauty hides
Of wintry storms the sullen threat;
But in thy sternest frown abides
A look of kindly promise yet.

Thou bring'st the hope of those calm skies
And that soft time of sunny showers
When the wide bloom on earth ..... Does,
Seems of a brighter world than ours.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"He that receiveth you receiveth me: and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me."—MATTHEW X, 40.

THE MISSION OF THE TWELVE.

We left the Saviour in the house of Jairus, where he had just given the first exhibition of his power to raise the dead to life. By this miracle he transformed a house of mourning into a house of joy. On his way home from the ruler's house he healed two blind men, and cast out of a man possessed a dumb devil. The Master saw that the time for him to leave had come, and so, in company with his disciples, he left Capernaum, and took his way to his native village—Nazareth. No doubt his arrival in the little village was noised by all the villagers; his last visit to his home, some ten months ago, had been the occasion of his rejection. His own friends treated his claims to being the Messiah with scorn and ridicule, even his own brothers joining in among the rest. But now he returns with a great reputation. He had traveled through the provinces of Judea and Samaria, and everywhere the same wonderful report of his wisdom and power followed him. He had a right to expect upon this second visit, a different reception. When the Sabbath came he began to teach in the synagogue. His fame drew him a full house. Many were there to hear him. His sermon produced great astonishment for its graceful eloquence, profound wisdom and originality, but gave great offense to many who heard him. The auditors criticised and interrupted him in his discourse. What was the offense? Was he presuming too far by thus attempting to teach in the synagogue? Had he not the right to stand there in the sacred desk? Had he not for thirty years resided in this town, and gone to and fro in its streets, in the eyes of all its inhabitants, walking with God blameless? Had he not achieved a name, without reproach and faultless, for himself throughout the land? Did not his knowledge of the Scriptures, his ability and power of utterance, and the weighty character of his thought, give him right to stand there and teach? His oratory was as phenomenal as it was captivating to his hearers, and all the more fascinating when it was known that he had received none of the advantages of school learning. In spite of all his gracious words and magnetic presence, there was offense given. The power of authority they could not detect from him. The originality of the truth was suggestive of his superiority, and oppressed the learned, who sat in his hearing, with the thought that his wisdom was profounder than all their books. The audacity of his claims were intolerable, as coming from a mere man, a carpenter, whose apprenticeship had been spent in his father's workshop in a despised provincial village, shaping the plow stocks for the farmers. Whence did he get these things? His idea of a spiritual kingdom of souls, the conditions of entering this kingdom, its laws and customs. Who imparted it to him? A covert sneer at this wisdom as being another's. It can not be his own, for we know him; he was raised among us. Some of these learned doctors of the law who felt that wisdom would die with them were pained at the absolute originality of his conceptions and the freshness of his thoughts, and they would fain blunt the edge of his truths by hinting at a foul plagerism at its source. They are forced, however, to admit the wisdom, for here before their eyes is the concrete power, the outward visible expression and proof of his wisdom are the mighty works wrought by his hands; but whence is this wisdom we can not tell; whether from above or beneath we can not say; but we do say that it can not be credited to this man.

Their contemptuous incredulity is not satisfied at the suggestion of its being the wisdom of the evil one, but they go further, and make the invidious allusion to his family connections. We know all about this wonder-worker and would-be-teacher, who and what he is, and from whence he drew his origin; not as fair as it might be; a cloud hangs around his birth; his mother and brethren are here among us.

Jesus answered them with a proverb: "A Prophet is not without honor but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house." The reason for their rejection of himself is given upon this principle in human nature, expressed in the familiar words, familiarity breeds contempt. Not because there was lack of evidence of his divine commission in the works he wrought, but because of his humble origin. That such a proverb could be true of men teaches that men can become so [illegible] to and familiar with the truth [illegible] turn it and lose all reverence, and was a sufficient reason for these rejectors of himself. The [illegible] reason of their rejection of him, in spite of conclusive evidence, was what the Bible calls unbelief. These Nazarenes were un-believers. The history states that this principle of unbelief was so present and prevalent that Christ was unable to do any mighty work; he was shut up to the minor works, such as the healing of a few sick folks, to a work upon the mere bodies, requiring not one tithe of the power necessary to work soul cures. He went about the villages teaching and marveling at their unbelief. His marveling did not stay his hand. That Christ should have marveled at their unbelief was itself a marvel. Two things Christ marveled at: Faith in man, its possibilities to raise him up beyond all height; unbelief in man, its possibilities to shut him away from the very reach of mercy.

No wonder that he should have marveled at their unbelief. Unbelief is as mysterious as death. How a human will can resist successfully the truth, when its irresistable power prevails with the conscience and judgment, is a marvel. Unbelief is a wonderful compound; made up of much belief, the result of the truth's power over conscience; and the other part is the un, made up of *un*willingness to render obedience to the truth and *un*willingness to be led by convictions. The very essence of war and enmity to the truth, it has in it the elements of an eternal dispeise. Unbelief is the principle of eternal death.

He must have been amazed to find that he had come to the end of his power. Though he was conscious that his divine power was still in him at full hand and vigor, and yet found opportunity and sphere for the exercise of it was lacking. He stood like a great giant with stone in his sling, but surprised to find that law of gravity ceasing to act upon the stone, its weight was gone, and what could a giant do with a feather. Some things are out of the sphere of power. An unconsenting human will is out of the sphere of moral power. There can be no putting forth of nor any exercise of moral power, unless there be two consenting wills. Jesus left Nazareth just as he leaves an unrepentant, unbelieving heart; because there was nothing for him to do there. After traveling about with the Master, and witnessing his method of teaching and work, the time came when, in the Master's opinion, the disciples were in a measure ready to help him in spreading the news of the kingdom. So he commissioned them by giving them as their credentials "power over unclean spirits," and sent them out, two and two, over the country to preach the kingdom, heal the sick and cast out devils. The reason for this sending out of these disciples may have been in answer to the eagerness of the people to hear the good news of the kingdom, which could not be satisfied by one preacher. It may be that the gathering opposition of the Pharisees suggested the training of the apostles who could preach the gospel and help meet the increasing pressure. Matthew says he sent them out because he pitied the multitude, who were like harrassed and panting sheep without a shepherd, and like a harvest left unreaped for want of laborers. The truth was the Saviour had reached a new stage of his work. There is something greater than preaching: it is to make preachers. There is something greater than performing miracles: it is to impart to others the power to perform them.

This sending out of the disciples was to make of them preachers who would be able to do greater things and preach greater sermons than any the Master did or preached. Compare Peter's first sermon in results with the sermon on the mount—the supreme effort of the Master. He labors to raise the apostles to his own level. This was the beginning of that sending out even to the end of the world. He began to send them. He is sending to-day. Oh, preachers, in your preaching have an eye to the work, Preach for preachers. You may win a soul to Christ, whose after history shall be more than all your preaching. This sending out was but a preparatory ministry—admitted into the traveling connection on trial: the rules and regulations laid down by the Master for this preparatory ministry were changed after awhile. He called them together again ere he left the world; gave them new directions and the promise of his presence even to the end of the world.

Short Articles on Providence—No. 3.

There is one more of Dr. Kelley's "freely-allowed" propositions which I feel constrained to notice. It is as follows: "The true doctrine is, that whenever a moral question has been adversely acted on by the State, the necessity for fearless, outspoken truth becomes more urgent upon the part of the church."

Let me say that I am bound in all charity to believe that Dr. Kelley wrote that sentence without weighing its import. It is not pertinent here to discuss the once-debated question of the moral right to own slaves. But if not pertinent to discuss it is also not pertinent to grant that, because the anti-slave side has won at a passage-at-arms, therefore it is right. The doctor has a right to believe as he chooses; but he has no right to dictate my belief. His implication assumes the whole question as decided, beyond controversy—puts the ayes for his side and shuts off the nays with the utmost coolness imaginable. In this "clearer light" let him sing his new song of rejoicing; but do not insist on others singing if they happen not to like it. Many of us do not feel yet prepared to pass the wholesale sentence upon the grand statesmen of the past, any more than to pronounce apotheosis upon the living.

But the implication contained in the sentence is by no means so objectionable as the expressed dictum. From a Roman Catholic prelate it would not sound strange; but to hear such from a Protestant of Protestants is indeed almost inconceivable. Hildebrand or Leo X. would have sent a cardinal's hat to a priest who would speak out in that way. When Roman prelates dictated to the proudest princes of Europe what laws they should pass; what ancestral or political affinities they should make; what men they should choose as advisers they did nothing more than practically carry out this dogma. It is the keystone of Jesuitism. It assumes that truth is what the church announces to be true and whoever believeth not let him be anathema! Carry it to its logical conclusion and you will reach what papacy reached when it commissioned legates and nuncios and spiritual advisers to all the courts of Europe. Think of the bureau of spiritual advice erected into a cabinet office in our Federal capital! Think of a branch office at each State capital, and as many subordinates as convenience might dictate and all these in communication with Congress and Legislatures, giving them the exact moral analysis of every bill presented! This looks absurd when written; and yet history (which Dr Kelley is sick of!) gravely informs us that it has all happened in lands no less favored than ours. Put up your moral steam gauge in every legislative hall, and run every candy pulling on regular prayer meeting principles! My father was a strict moralist. His methods of enforcement were emphatic and according to Solomon. But he neither sang nor prayed while enforcing, nor did he have doxology or benediction afterward. I thought he was right. I never have doubted the orthodoxy of his morality in an active state of eruption. For one I believe that Legislatures composed of good and true men who know their constituents are not more apt to legislate wrongly than are our church legislators. All are alike fallible. In Cæsar's matters they are better informed than we, and we have no right to pronounce maledictions merely because they legislate contrary to what we think right. To fulminate bulls of excommunication, or to berate and vituperate is not our divine right. We have the right to preach. We have the right to petition. We have the right to protest. But neither one nor all these can give the right to dictate or veto.

Let us be careful here. The temporary triumph that attends the Northern wing of Methodism, in virtue of having so vigorously championed abolitionism, should not turn our heads. "We walk by faith," i. e., by a settled conviction of truth in the word of God. That is a "tramp for our feet." Its largest liberty ignores the physical relations of slave and master, and the moral except as those of man to man everywhere. But the social remain intact. The political are ignored. This is the conclusion I reach from a study of the Bible. Others may have reached other conclusions. But there is no warrant to have these convictions modified by the results of the war of 1860-4. Nor are we to allow them to be modified by any thing else. This temporary triumph has another bad feature, viz.: It has made the victorious wing of Methodism a political church. Its ministers can not keep out of politics. They pray, preach, and pass resolutions during their Conference sessions in reference to the election of party candidates and the passage of party measures: Loyalty to party is loyalty to country, and vice versa. This poison has permeated the whole church and infected the whole party, until they are almost synonomous. Let us beware lest we taking up the pernicious dogma do not also entangle ourselves in political issues.

Only the following in reference to Providence in this last paper of criticism upon Dr. Kelley's article: Let us not take for granted that the Divine favor is most upon them that are growing richest and strongest. The kingdom of Christ comes not by observation. We are not to look at things seen—phenomena as Paul puts it. What can we argue from them? Only after the largest observation can we form a generalization which announces a degree of probability in direct ratio with the observations. How narrow yet that field of observation! What shall we say twenty years hence relative to what now seems so clear? We can only say that we and the times have seen changes; but whether the vicissitudes of life will convict of mistakes and misdeeds is doubtful. Our opinions may change; but opinions must never be regarded as hypothetical arguments even, much less as infallibly true. Our opinions may affect or be affected by surroundings; but these, at no stage of ardor and candor, should ever in the least modify those moral reckonings which we make upon the basis of Scripture alone. The phases of faith may vary with temporal changes; but its spiritual essence is the same for time and eternity.

Rather Watery.

Land and water hereabouts are not seemingly well adjusted. Water is the highest. Considerable losses, inconvenience and damage, but no suffering in the Yazoo river portion of the Yazoo Valley that I know of. The suffering is in the interior and Mississippi river portions.

Here our condition is awkward and a little expensive. Horses, mules and cattle sent to the hills; hogs in the gin-loft; corn etc. scaffolded up out of danger; women and children in Yazoo City; house floor fourteen inches out, and water only two feet deep in the yard and garden, rising only about four inches a day; but it will no doubt stop after a while. Rain ceased and weather fine.

And if the Mississippi river at St. Louis will continue to behave well, we will probably be plowing and planting in six weeks; and this will give sufficient time to repair fences and make a crop. And then when it is considered that corn and cotton will mature a month earlier than otherwise, the prospect is not so discouraging. If this present flood-tide was at the middle of May, things would look worse; but this writing is at the middle of March. Upon the whole, there is nothing in plain sight now to forbid the making a good crop in this portion of the overflow in the year of our Lord, 1882.

Our dwelling-houses and corn-cribs are not floating down the river; our live stock is not drowned, or, if perchance, a very little of it. More than a thousand horses and mules have floated down the river within a hundred yards of where I write, since the rising of the sun this morning; not dead carcasses, but comfortably housed on fine large steamers and ferryboats. We are all improving in the boating business. For myself, I have been capsized and ducked but once in the present freshet, and then where the water was not over ten feet deep. But I learned to swim more than sixty years ago.

Our land is not washed and injured, as is generally the case with inland rivers; but, on the contrary, is greatly enriched by the capillary sediment. Much of our fencing is washed away; but most of the rails will lodge in the adjacent timber and can be gathered again.

The [illegible] the people is good, and the [illegible]ing in sight is the good providence of the great God.

More About the Floods.

MR. EDITOR: Words can not express our feelings to-night. For two or three weeks past our "bottom planters" have been more or less anxious about the waters; but not till within the last week has there been any great experience in our section of the much dreaded and lathed of overflow. The waters are surely upon us now. Two, four and six inches per day have gradually marked our rise, till now, by a sudden sweep in the past few days, all is one unbroken scene of water and desolation. The steamboat men bring in most gloomy and heart-rending accounts both from below and above us. Every trip they make they bring to our town stock (especially mules) and people, white and black, in great numbers. And yet there are others who cry out for help and are denied, simply because of impossibility to accomodate. Flatboat after flatboat loads of cattle are landed in our town and driven through to the hills for safety. What becomes of the mules and negroes I do not know. It seems enough have already come out to take up all the tillable hill land in the country not previously provided for. The town of Greenwood above us is reported from four to six feet under water. A wave of three or four feet struck them a day or two since which completely submerged and did great damage. Truly, Mr. Editor, the condition of affairs is appalling. What we hear is only a little of the great amount of destruction in way of stock, fences and improvements among the farmers. A rise of two or three feet is reported as coming down on us. We are hourly expecting its appearance. Many of our people have abandoned their houses after remaining in them to the last minute, and many others get about on elevated walks—there being from one to three feet of water under them. These are houses near the bayou which runs around our west and north sides. Of course others will suffer as the water rises, though most of our people are above the highest water marks from Noah down to date. Add to all this the fact of two poor and unremunerative crops in succession; nine-tenths of the planters behind; labor demoralized and the present high price of all produce—all of which must be bought for the year, and we have a dark, dark picture to the planters in the overflow districts. Many pronounce themselves ruined, which, no doubt, is generally true. One thing sure: he who surmounts the disasters and embarrassments of this flood has a heart and will be worthy of our greatest admiration. Bro. Hunnicutt was with us several days last week much to our delight and profit. I find him equally as interested in and concerned about the preachers and their works as he used to be over his class in Virgil, or those spouting at the tupto, tuptes, tuptei—enough to discourage any man, I thought, but him. The work must be done; the young ideas taught to shoot; he was the man to conduct the plan. So he works and plans in his high office of presiding elder.

Fraternally,

T. B. HOLLOMAN.

Meeting of the Woman's Temperance Union.

A meeting of this organization was held in the parlors of the Young Men's Christian Association, in New Orleans, March 14.

Miss Frances E. Willard was present, presiding and making an opportune and interesting address. Mrs. E. T. Merrick was elected president of the Woman's Christian Union of New Orleans.

Mrs. J. J. Lyons, the former president, presented the following report:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union was organized in New Orleans March 2, 1876. The cause was unpopular and met with little encouragement. The few who had the courage to brave public opinion met together from week to week, in order to unite their efforts and to fortify and encourage one another to take a firm stand in favor of temperance. Another object was to inculcate temperance principles in the minds and hearts of the young; to use all Christian means and influences to induce reformation from the use of intoxicating drink.

Mrs. Dr. Keating was president the first year, Mrs. Coop secretary, Mrs. Harp treasurer. Our only source of revenue was the dues of our members. That amount was so small we decided to get up a series of parlor entertainments, to which a dime entrance fee was charged and refreshments sold. They were largely attended, and consisted of temperance readings, recitations and music. They helped wonderfully to create and diffuse a temperance sentiment among our young people. With a portion of the money we bought and distributed temperance papers, tracts, etc.

For many months we paid rent for the rooms in which we held our meetings—and in various ways helped the needy who came in our way. I will give one incident to illustrate: In the columns of the Picayune of January 1, 1878, there appeared an earnest appeal written by Miss Charlotte Holbrook, one of our members (now a missionary in Mexico), to the ladies of New Orleans, begging them for the sake of the dear ones to abstain from the usual custom of offering wines, and liquors that intoxicate, on that day. This went forth with many prayers. It was effectual. Many instances came to our knowledge where the decanters already filled were carefully put away. But I hasten to give you the most important result. The appeal was signed by every member of the W. C. T. U.—among them several gentlemen who are honorary members.

On that bright New Year's morning in the suburbs of our city, sat an almost broken hearted wife and four children. Her husband, while under the influence of liquor, had been arrested and was then languishing in prison. Once he was kind, brave and true; now, without employment, weak, helpless.

As the newsboy passed her door he threw in a paper. (God only knows why). Listlessly opening the paper, the appeal on the first page caught her eye, and among the names that one that had been familiar, years before in her girlhood's home. She exclaimed, can it be possible? Yes, this is the name of my father's friend I will search for him this very day; perhaps he can do something for our relief. In the afternoon she was rewarded by finding his residence, and soon was ushered into his presence, and told her sad story. The gentleman went with her at once to see her husband—found him ready and willing to do anything to atone for the past. Through special efforts he was soon released and took the pledge.

A committee from our association was immediately sent to relieve their wants. The gratuitous services of a physician were procured; medicines paid for; moved them to more comfortable quarters; assisted in obtaining employment, and thus helped them on to a purer and better life. In the winter of 1879 we held a series of gospel temperance meetings. A committee of ladies visited all the [illegible] and ministers and requested [illegible] operation. Services were held in every church where the responses were favorable. On every occasion the pledge was presented and many signatures obtained. In the winter of 1880 we distributed 1,600 copies of Dr. Haygood's "Close the Saloons, or Prohibition." The year 1881 is memorable for the rescue of a woman who was educated, refined and cultivated. She had spent years in teaching, but having lost her position as teacher, and unfit to make a living in any other way, she had fallen a victim to intemperance. She was the mother of four boys. Her case having been presented to the W. C. T. U., two ladies volunteered to visit her and save her if possible. This resulted in her solemnly taking the pledge, which she kept faithfully unto death. Her wants included a home and every other necessity. These were provided as far as our funds would permit. These are some proofs of our efforts to do good. Many times our faith has been weak and our hearts weary, but then we have been cheered by the motto adopted at our organization: "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

Daily Christian Advocate.

A Daily Advocate will be issued from the Publishing House during the session of the General Conference, which meets at Nashville, Tenn., on the third day of May next.

On account of the importance of this Conference and the anxiety for early and full information, this paper will have a very large circulation. It will be brought out in first-class style, printed with new type on good paper—16 pages, pasted and trimmed in the same form as the Christian Advocate.

To assist in paying the heavy expense of getting up such a paper, a small proportion of the space will be allowed to advertisers. Rates have been fixed at the low price of 10 cents per line, or $1.40 per inch, for each insertion—or $1 per line for daily insertion during the whole time the Conference is in session. We respectfully invite presidents of schools and colleges, merchants, manufacturers and others, who have first-class enterprises on hand, to avail themselves of this excellent opportunity to bring their advertisements before a large number of the best people in the South.

A specimen number of the paper will be issued on the first day of April, and all advertisements ordered for the full term of the Conference will be inserted in this specimen number FREE provided they are sent in by the twenty-eighth day of March.

The subscription price of this paper for the session is $1, postage paid. Copies of the specimen issue of April 1 will be sent to all subscribers, and all others who will forward their names, inclosing a 3 cent postage stamp.

A large number of extra copies will be printed from day to day, so that subscribers can get all the back numbers, and those who desire it can have a bound copy forwarded to them, a few days after the adjournment of the General Conference, postage paid, for $1.50. Send in orders at once that the names may be set in type for our mail list.

"SICK AND IN PRISON."

BY INVALID.

All bright without, the golden sun on hill and valley lies,
Where glad birds sing, and flowers bloom beneath the cloud-painted skies.
The fragrance of these vernal flowers is wafted to me now,
They soothe me, as a gentle hand laid on my fevered brow.

The song-birds in the wildwood sing—how sweet to me the sound!
The blue-eyed violets in the wood are blooming all around!
How many voices call me—those voices glad and sweet!
Oh! how I long once more to feel the grass beneath my feet!

To wander by the crystal brook that ripples on its way,
And listen to its "unknown tongue" that babbles all the day!
And yet it seems I cannot know the words it speaks to me,
As thro' the valeslies, shady dells it wanders to the sea.

O! glad bird, in the wildwood sing! O! flowers, in beauty bloom!
O! sun, to me thy brightness bring, to cheer my prison gloom:
And I will sing my gladdest song, and learn from what I've heard,
That I may, as I linger here, sing like the captive bird.

That I may, like the hidden flowers, tho' bruised and almost crushed,
Breathe around my lowly path, tho' life's glad music's hushed;
The fragrance of a patient life, made up of pain and care,
Until life's midnight prison gloom grows bright with song and prayer.

Colportage Sketches—No. 22.

BY A. M. JONES.

"THESE BIBLES ARE NOT THE RIGHT SORT."

My colportage mission being to all people, I visited families indiscriminately, and every church, as far as possible, regardless of denomination or color. During the summer of 1879 a minister of the gospel kindly published a number of appointments for me in a country paper, extending over considerable territory, and embracing various Christian sects. While on my way to fill one of these engagements I learned that on the previous Saturday the members had quite a warm discussion, but finally, by a unanimous vote, decided in favor of the Bible man having the use of the church. The pastor, an aged, influential minister, stated to his congregation that he had seen and examined one of the Bibles, and, while it was not altogether like the old-fashioned one, yet if they would be cautious perhaps there was not enough difference to do much harm. On my arrival I was astonished at the multitude of people. The discussion, only a few days before, had excited interest, and, though a week day, they had turned out in mass to see what was to be done. Stopping under the shade of a tree, I introduced myself, and immediately began to exhibit the books. With eagerness the crowd gathered around, and in astonishment pronounced them the cheapest they had ever seen. As soon as they made their selections they began to buy, and for a half hour I was busy changing money and handing them out. When the pressure was a little over a man of about twenty-seven, lank, lean and pale, came up, and began to examine a Bible, priced $1 20, the very marvel of cheapness. After trying for some time to jew me down, which, of course, he fixed to do, borrowed the money and made the purchase. As my late friend turned away a tall, knowing-looking gentleman, who had used many extravagant expressions as to the cheapness of the books, came forward and said: "I want one for each of my children. Give me six twenty-five cent Bibles, and that large Testament and Psalms for myself." He walked away in triumph with his arm full of books, which cost him only $2 25. I will not forget the kindness of a gentleman, whose name has passed from my memory, who helped me unhitch and hitch my horses, went to the spring after water, conducted me to the pulpit, directed me to an excellent family near by for dinner, and did everything else within his power to make me feel at ease, that hot summer day, among suspicious strangers. After preaching to a very attentive audience, and delivering a Bible lecture of some length, the congregation was dismissed, when those who seemed to have been in doubt came around the buggy again, and bought books until more than half my fresh supply was gone. In the very midst, while exceedingly busy changing money and handing out books, my lean and knowing customers returned, and the tall man, being spokesman, said in an excited tone of voice: "These Bibles are not the right sort, and we want you to take them back. Will you do so, and give us our money?" I suppose so. What is the matter? "We have examined them, and find they are not like the old-fashioned ones. Will you take them back?" Yes; but you had better keep them; they are all right. The American Bible Society's books are used by all denominations. They are not making money by sending the Bible into this country, simply endeavoring to get them into the homes of the people. "We don't know anything about your Bible Society; never heard of it before." While returning the money I said: Do you suppose I would sell you a spurious Bible? "We don't know anything about you, sir." I was afraid others might do likewise, but not so. They continued to supply themselves as though nothing had occurred. The next day I learned the following story, which explained the knowing man's position. A book agent was passing through that community some years ago, delivering Bibles, which he had sold on subscription. This tall man saw them, and, not liking the pictures, told the agent if he would bring one without pictures he would give him $8 for it. In less than three days the book was there, and the agent received the $8. He simply drove down to the courthouse, and bought an American Bible Society book for $1. The tall man, having learned this fact, has looked with suspicion on all Bible men ever since. I learned afterward that they were heartily ashamed of having returned the Bibles. My readers can hardly conceive the difficulties in the way of the colportage work.

An Elect Lady.

Though the Rev. R. J. Jones has recently given a very just and discriminating analysis of the character of the late Mrs. John A. Ellis, still my intimate acquaintance with her, and my appreciation of her rare qualifications, impel me to write somewhat of her. Our acquaintance began in a protracted meeting, in which she was a most zealous and successful worker, and to which I had gone for the express purpose of deciding the momentous question of a call to preach the gospel. She made my doubting heart to glow with her estimate of the exalted mission of a true minister of Christ, and she encouraged my shrinking purpose by assuring me, in her own quiet, convincing way, that I, even I, had some gifts and graces for the blessed calling. It has since been my privilege to be her pastor, and to meet with her regularly in class, and in all our association together her clear intellect and warm heart, sustaining her in a life of entire consecration to the service of her Master, have given to me much light and strength of purpose. She was a helpful hearer; oftentimes her wrapt attention and radiant face would inspirit the preacher. She was a wise counsellor; one need have no hesitancy in adopting her opinions. She was a useful pastor's assistant, humbly receiving and faithfully executing any commission to watch over the flock, to visit the sick or reclaim the wandering.

Nature and fortune seemed to combine in bestowing upon Mrs. Ellis those qualifications which would naturally result in developing a high character and an honored career. She was gifted by Providence with a person that was commanding as well as attractive, and with a mind strong in its grasp and quick in its discrimination between the false and the true. She was reared in a genuine Southern home, where wealth could gratify every desire, where taste and culture could develop the æsthetical nature to its highest capacity, where pure morals and Christian faith unfeigned threw their halo over all. Her parents were born of gentle blood, and made good their claim to the true nobility by being early partakers of the Divine nature, and by walking worthy of their high character. Her father combined characteristics, and adorned them, that seldom meet in the same person. As a lawyer he attained eminence in his profession, wearing unsullied the judicial ermine. As a Christian minister he was dignified almost to sternness, yet his kindly, genial nature unbent in association and sympathy with all. His sermons were of that high order that could result only from the combination of two qualifications, viz.: an intellect clear and cultivated, and a soul capable of appreciating the incomparable mission of the pulpit. It was deemed a privilege to have known and heard such a man, and of course his example and teaching could not fail of impressing themselves upon the receptive nature of his daughter.

Though in early life, from the social circle in which she moved, there were placed before her all the blandishments of worldly pleasure in its purest and most attractive forms, she intelligently and deliberately chose the pleasures of religion, and, having made the choice, she devoted herself to it all through life with an energy furnished by a clear apprehension of truth, and with a will sufficiently resolute to adhere to a governing purpose in spite of temptation from within or opposition from without. Being a decided character, she became a decided Christian; holding herself to a rigid standard, she could brook no vacillatation in others. So uncompromising was her opposition to any inconsistency of character, and so outspoken her condemnation of it, that those who did not know her intimately were ready to say that she was censorious, but where she had confidence in one's piety no person could be more deferential or teachable. Recognition of the Spirit of her Master in the humblest of his disciples elicited her warm affections and retained her unquestioning confidence.

She dearly loved the Methodist Church, the church of her father, the church of her choice in youth, as well as mature age. Her conduct unmistakably demonstrated this. No one would leave a comfortable home, a fertile plantation, affording an easy, even a luxurious living, and voluntarily assume the precarious lot of the Methodist itinerancy, whose heart and soul were not in the choice.

She met death in the same spirit in which she had been accustomed to live—a calm and heroic effort to be ready. Having written a letter of affectionate farewell, and of pious counsel to each of her loved ones, to be read after her death, she deliberately set her house in order, and, when the summons came, it found her watching.

I esteem it a blessing to have been associated with such a life, and such a death makes me say with increased emphasis: "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

C. G. ANDREWS.

Trifling With a Heart.

When I was about twenty I paid considerable attention to a young lady, near my own age, for several consecutive months. Marriage was never hinted at or, so far as I know, thought of. It was the style for lads of my age to have sweethearts, and I followed the fashion. When we separated I felt some regret; a somewhat lonely feeling, with its slight tinge of sadness, followed me for some weeks. I had some reason to believe that I was not the only or perhaps chief sufferer from this little flirtation. At that time I had not read Irvin's Sketch-Book.

In my twenty-third year I went to Philadelphia, to remain several months. I was then a professor of religion. I made the acquaintance of a very interesting young lady; she was about seventeen, modest, intelligent, and, withal, a Christian. I took the precaution to inform her very early that I was engaged, having thus secured her against any possible misunderstanding. I felt more at liberty in her company. Without hesitation I professed a fondness for her society, which was needless, for my actions proclaimed it stronger than any words I could frame. I was with her much in my hours of recreation, attended her to church, to lectures, to concerts, chatted pleasantly with her as we strolled around among the curiosities in the Academy of Natural Sciences, the pictures and statuary of the Art Gallery, the souvenirs and relics of Independence Hall. I had nothing in view but to pass the time pleasantly. The day arrived for me to leave the city. The thoughts of soon meeting many friends, my loving sisters, fond mother, and one other, filled my heart with gladness. I bade my lady friend good-bye, but in her face was sadness. She handed me a letter, saying: "Read to-morrow." The next day, as the fast flying train was bearing me on toward the objects I loved, and I drifting from one delightful revery to another, I thought of her letter, took it out of my pocket and read. She complimented what she was pleased to call my "cautious, urbane and Christian-like deportment toward her." She said: "Go be faithful to the one you fondly love; your frequent, tender reference to should have been enough for me, but, alas! alas! My cheeks tingle with a blush as I write this; but these cheeks your eyes will behold no more; good-bye forever." Was I guiltless? I aver that on my part there was not the least intention of wrong. But did I not do wrong? It is wrong for a man to trifle with the feelings of a lady. If a gentleman gives special attention to a lady, of suitable age and surroundings for several months, she has a right to put a construction upon his intentions: He may never say a single word about love and marriage; it does not alter the case. This constant attention is an appeal to the heart, that may enlist the feelings of the most modest and most cautious young lady; they arise from her unbidden and unexpected. They finally separate, she to nurse a hidden grief that she is ashamed to acknowledge to herself; he to make similar havoc in other quarters. I suppose possibly a conceited coxcomb might rather like this. But an honorable gentleman would never willingly or wantonly be guilty.

The Gospel Rule.

"Friend, I do thee no wrong; didst not thou agree with me for a penny?"

MR. EDITOR: The articles in the last ADVOCATE, signed Henry D. Moore and J. P., suggested to my mind the above text. Will either one of them harmonize their theory of dividing the Conference money with the above verse. Again, a minister of eight or ten years' membership in a Conference may die, leaving a wife, and six or seven children to raise and educate; the old veteran's family is raised, and none but himself and wife. Again, a minister may hold membership thirty, forty or fifty years, and be in a college all the time, never having experienced the rough places in the itinerancy, and yet he will have more in the division than the itinerant of twenty years. "Enquire for the old paths," and excercise caution and good judgment in receiving men into the traveling connection. But few men will make good itinerants after they pass forty or fifty years. I have not written this to tantalize, only for information, and may God direct us in all wisdom is my prayer.

From the Work.

EAST FELICIANA, LA.

MR. EDITOR: You did me the honor, on one occasion, to express a desire that I should contribute something to the columns of your most excellent paper, that weekly visitor whose coming is ever hailed with delight, and whose presence is as sunshine in our homes. Hitherto numerous domestic cares, together with other engagements, joined to a wholesome aversion I have always had for writing when one has nothing to say, have restrained me. A few brief notes, however, from East Feliciana parish may not be unacceptable. This is our second year on the East Feliciana circuit, a work quite above the average in wealth, numbers and intelligence. Many of our people, I have reason to believe, are persons of solid piety, useful and active members of the church. The preacher has been aided and encouraged in his labors, and his family supported.

It is true we have had none of those delightful poundings or donation parties so glowingly described by many others, when innumerable "good things" find their way into the parsonage store-room, the very perusal of which brings a perceptible moisture to the lips. We have heard of these things "afar off," but they have not happened unto us since our sojourn began here. We have, however, met with uniform kindness, and have been made to feel, in a quiet, unostentatious manner, that we were remembered.

There are seven churches on the work, and six Sunday-schools in successful operation. The superintendent of the Clear Creek Sunday-school, Dr. W. F. Roberts, is what Dr. Winfield would call a "Singist." I call him a fine singer, and not only so, but he sees to it that every member of the Sunday-school is supplied with a note edition of "New Life," and taught to sing; and I am told they can sing every song in that admirable collection. Here is an example worthy of imitation.

Mr. Parker is exerting himself this year to supply our people with our own song-books, hymn-books and other good reading matter from our Publishing House. The ADVOCATE too—how I long to see it in every Christian family, for wherever our church papers are read there is an intelligent appreciation of the gospel, and a disposition to support it.

Our home is in Clinton, a fine inland town of twelve hundred inhabitants. It is noted for its extreme healthfulness, refined society and superior educational advantages. We have here no less than five flourishing schools.

The Silliman Institute is an old and well-endowed institution, numbering among its Alumnæ some of the most accomplished ladies in our midst. It has, the present session, considerably over one hundred pupils. Clinton Female Academy is also a school of high grade, and is in a flourishing condition.

The newly-appointed pastor of our church here, Rev. C. A. Powell, has, so so far as I can learn, made a fine impression. He is an earnest and faithful minister of the gospel, and entirely devoted to his work.

Regret to state that our presiding elder, Rev. D. A. Little, is in very poor health. He has been having chills for several months, and seems quite enfeebled. He is, however, performing his arduous duties faithfully.

The incumbent of the Woodville district has a position which is by no means a sinecure. And now, Mr. Editor, I close for the present. Should I find something to say I may write again. Yours truly,

MARY J. PARKER.

CLINTON, LA., March 8, 1882.

MT. OLIVET CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Mt. Olivet circuit, though it bears an old, time-honored name, is a new work, composed of the extreme ends of the former Mt. Olivet and North Warren circuits. Consequently we have no parsonage, the old circuits, according to usage and higher precedent, holding the property. Is this as it should be? Is it right, in the change of circuit boundaries that so often occur, to cut off a church from a parsonage that she has helped to pay for, and add on others that took no part in the matter without, in some degree, indemnifying the former? This thing often happens, and militates much against our parsonage interest on the circuits. Is there no remedy for this evil? Can not you give us an editorial on the subject? I write not complainingly, but simply stating facts. As for me and mine, we are and have ever been provided for. "The over-faithful few" have rented us a house, and furnished it with new furniture, intending to build or buy a house during the year.

So, after a move of three hundred and seventy miles, by water, rail and mud (and all at my own expense,) being on the wing the entire month of January, we are again comfortably domiciled at Mt. Olivet, among a good people, full of work and hope. Have made nearly two rounds on my work, and find many good people, and not a few that need a "workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

The Advocates are extensively circulated and read by our people. Hoping to extend their circulation further, I am, fraternally,

P. HOWARD.

SATARTIA, MISS., March 6, 1882.

BAYOU SARA, LA.

MR. EDITOR: Our first Quarterly Conference was held in this place on the fourth and fifth of this month. Bro. Little, our presiding elder, was with us, preaching with power and profit three truly gospel sermons. It was truly refreshing, both to preacher and people. We are anxious for the second quarter to come, and bring with it our much-loved preacher. Our little town is in quite a state of excitement over the high stage of the water against its levees, looking for a break at any moment, which would be very destructive to property. The crevasse which occurred a few days ago on the opposite side of the river is doing great damage to property of every kind. Stock in great numbers may be seen on the levee opposite our town; some have been brought over, and the people are moving out continually.

The situation is indeed appalling. A flat load of cattle and horses was brought down from Cat Island on yesterday in almost a starving condition, having stood in the water for days without food. Dead cattle, sheep and hogs abound, and families are destitute even of the necessities of life. I do not like to dwell on the subject; no one can form an idea as they gather the items from the papers; to see it is the only way. God, who holds the reigns of the floods, only knows where, how or when it will end. We await his action. Pray for us.

Obituaries.

WILKINS—The subject of this short memoir Mrs. LUCY WILKINS, my wife's grandmother, (maiden name Moss), was born in Sharon, Mass., August 5, 1793; married Josiah Wilkins, 1813; moved to Mobile, Ala., 1825; joined the Franklin Street Methodist Episcopal Church under the ministry of the late Rev. Jefferson Hamilton, D. D., 1840, and died at the home of her son, Charles E. Wilkins, near Mobile, December 10, 1881. During her long life, exceeding through eighty-eight years, four months and five days, she saw many and varied changes in Church and State. In 1825, Mobile was simply a small rude village, inhabited principally by Creoles, with only an occasional American family. All that then society was poor, and religious and social advantages meagre. With the increase of population and wealth schools and churches were built up, and here she nobly and piously trained and educated her four sons (one having died in childhood) and two daughters. In 1846, her husband died, leaving her the entire responsibility of the family. No mother was ever more devoted to her children, none ever discharged her duties towards them more tenderly or faithfully. I was impressed with the tone of a letter she handed me to read a few years ago from her son, Dr. Rushrod R. Wilkins, of Austin, Texas, who died only a few months before his mother, which closed with the touching expression: "From an affectionate son to the very best of mothers." Possessing the highest order of native intellect, and having her mind well cultured by so many years of incessant and profitable reading, she accumulated many vast stores of useful knowledge. Was familiar with every important historical period, and knew the history of America from the beginning to the present decade. So strong was her mind and so tenacious her memory, that within a few months before her death, she, without hesitation, could quote extensively from various poetical authors. She read Clarke's Commentaries through, time and again, other books and literature on Methodist theology, and all the standard sermons of the church. But with all her reading, the Bible was her daily companion. When possible, no day was permitted to pass without refreshing her spirit by perusing and meditating on some portion of the Holy Scriptures. Being a conscientious observer of the Sabbath and never permitting herself to be idle, of course, during so many years, she had time to read many, many books. Her religious life was quiet, even and onward; her faith in the Son of God and the promises of the Bible unwavering. She had an intelligent, a saving faith in Christ, and believed every word of the blessed Bible. She frequently spoke to me of her extreme age, and of the goodness of God in permitting her to live so long. She was well prepared for the "saints eternal home." Her energy continued to the last; but having been stricken down with paralysis more than two years before her death, her strength gave way, and she was forced to spend the remaining days without work, and, as her sight had become so dim, she could not read. Her decline was long and somewhat painful, but she bore it all with the resignation of a Christian, and without a murmur. Her husband, five children, a number of grandchildren and great-grandchildren were in heaven, and she was prepared and waiting to go. When I bid her farewell at Birmingham last fall, she said: "I am going to Mobile again, and will never see you again. Pray for me." In a few days after that time she returned to her son's near Mobile to die. So she has been gathered to her fathers. When the last hour came, she was ready and trusting in the Saviour, and, without the least struggle, passed away as gently as the evening zephyr. This aged mother in Israel, the last of those who lived in Mobile in 1825, is gone. May God bless her surviving son and daughter, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and finally bring them to that land where there will be no more death nor sorrow forever.

WILLIAMS—Mrs. MARTHA J. WILLIAMS was born at Spring Hill, Marengo county, Ala., and died at Selma, Ala., January 1, 1882.

This is the brief record of a life and death in which many of the best elements of Christianized humanity found exemplification. Sister Williams joined the Methodist Church at Spring Hill, Ala., in childhood. She was married in her eighteenth year, and moved to Demopolis, where she at once connected herself with the church in which the greater part of her life was spent. With all the ardor of young womanhood she applied her heart to its teaching, and her hands to its work. Because her heart was ever warm with the rich inspiration of God's grace, she was always found actively engaged in the work which his church found for her to do. The love of Christ constrained her, and she was no laggard in his service. In the Sunday-school, especially, she was zealous and helpful, winning the love and confidence of the children by her quiet sympathetic character and consistent daily walk. In every relation of life the faith which works by love was manifest.

Hers was not a life of joyous ease and unclouded calm. Much of earth's sorrow marked her way to heaven; but in the sunlight and the shadow she was cheerful and acquiescent in the doings of her God, sustained and strengthened always by unfaltering faith in him.

It was the writer's privilege to know her intimately during his pastorage in Demopolis, and to visit her in her illness and witness the calmness and peace with which she met the last enemy. It was a peaceful death. The end of such a life must be so. From the first she expressed the opinion that her sickness was unto death, and contemplated the dissolution with a quietude in perfect accord with the proposition which long before she had accepted. "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord, and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." To her death was rest from labor—a departure from the strife and turmoil of this world to be forever with the Lord.

So he giveth his beloved sleep. She was meet for that blessed slumber, and without a doubt or fear looked forward to the possession of the home which her Lord and ours has prepared for them that love him. Behind her are left one child—an only son to whom much of her life was devoted—and a host of friends who miss her sadly. She was comparatively a stranger here in Selma; but tender hands of Christian women ministered to her wants as though she was a relative, and she lacked nothing which human love and sympathy could give.

G. M. ROPER.

NEVILLE—Died in Holmes Co. Miss., December 16, 1881, Mrs. MARY C., wife of Robert Neville. She was the daughter of A. A., and M. Porter, born Sept. 9, 1839, and was married January 14, 1875. In her death we are reminded of a common experience in the loss of many of the greatest blessings and comforts of this life; we seem not to know how to appreciate their value and worth until we are deprived of them. Respected and beloved by kind friends and an affectionate household, her death has produced a vacancy that can be thought of, only with intense sadness and grief. From a child she was religiously inclined. In 1854 she made a profession of religion. In 1858 she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in which she lived and died a firm and unwavering member of the same. No young person perhaps in the community were she lived wielded such an influence in favor of piety as she did. Her life was religion practically taught. Amid all the fascinations of life and the voice of the world, calling in gay glad tones to win her back, she turned not aside but looking steadily onward pursued the path which leads to life eternal. In all the relations of life she was truly a pattern; as a daughter, sister, wife, mother, neighbor, friend, she lived without reproach; as a christian she was humble, retiring and blameless. She had a desire to live on account of her husband and children, but if it was God's will for her to die, she would submit. To her husband her loss is irreparable. She was indeed a helpmate to him in all the relations of life. To her children she has left a legacy of purity and truth, and they rise up and call her blessed. Precious unto the Lord is the death of his saints! Her record is on high, and may her father and mother, husband and children, brothers and sisters, strive to meet her in the better land where there is no more parting, suffering or tears.

CHILES—Died at her home at Lauderdale Springs, Mississippi, on Thursday morning, January, 12, 1882, Mrs. JESSIE E. CHILES, wife of N. A. Chiles, Esq., and daughter of the late Alexander and Elizabeth J. Glascock, in the 26th year of her age.

The announcement of the death of this lovely lady saddened many a heart, not only in the community in which she lived and to which she had greatly endeared herself, but also in other communities in which she had been educated and which had known her but to love her. It is sometimes difficult for the writer of obituary tributes to find flowers to gather from the lives of the "loved and lost;" but if the many fragrant qualities that adorned the character of her for whom we mourn could be woven into wreaths, they would form bright and fitting ornaments to place upon her early tomb. Though she was left an orphan soon after her young life began, yet the memory of a father who was noble and upright in every word and work, and of a sainted mother who was the embodiment of all that is truly beautiful in womanhood and Christianity, ever hung as a blessing around her.

In early girlhood, she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and became a beautiful and devoted follower of the Lamb. Patience, gentleness, modesty, kindness, intense affection for those whose tender care was around her, were some of the Christian graces that shone brightly in her character. During her long sickness, she murmured not. She saw God's hand in everything. Hard was it to part from the manly one whom she had so lately joined in the journey of life; hard, indeed, to leave the bright little one that God had sent to gladden their home. But it was her Father's will and calmly, serenely, she passed to the Saviour's Heaven.

MORRIS—Mrs. LOUISA MORRIS, the subject of this notice, was born in Pendleton district, S. C., October 12, 1806, and departed this life November 25, 1881.

She had made her home at the residence of her eldest son, in this place, for nearly four years. Her maiden name was Jones, and about the age of six she, with her father, emigrated to Ohio, where they lived three or four years, thence moving to Bedford county, Tenn., where her father raised his family. At an early age she joined the Methodist Church, and was married to Thomas Morris, March 12, 1829. To them eleven children—five sons and six daughters—were born, two of the latter dying in 1876. She left nine children and about sixty grand and great-grandchildren to mourn her loss. Thomas Morris moved to this place in 1867, and lived here until his death in 1876. After their marriage both joined the Baptist Church, and were devoted members for forty-eight years. Mrs. Morris had been in declining health for several months; but was confined to her bed for only two weeks. The best of medical skill failed to avert the inevitable, and the home-call found her ready and willing to go. Like the ripe ear of corn she, in her old age, has been gathered home, and we can only say: God's will be done.

WORMACK—Mrs. MATHILDA WORMACK, died near Greensburg, La., December 29, 1881, aged forty years. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. She had been a member of the church for many years. She was a friend indeed to the orphans, to the afflicted, and to the pastor. She had an abiding interest in her church, and her faith in the merits of Christ was strong and steadfast. The care, anxiety, and attention and love given to her deceased sister's children was beautiful to behold. An auntie's heart was so true and loving that her actions and words were those of a mother. If love and constancy of attention to the children of the dead are marks of nobleness, she was noble indeed. She was prepared to die. She was willing to die. Heaven seemed near to her in her last days. She delighted to talk of heaven. A short time before her death she told her brother-in-law—Bro. Lindsay—that she was going to die, that her mother and sister came to her in her dreams. They did come, and she is gone gone to live with Christ forever. I expect to see our sister again.

BALDWIN—Resolutions passed by the Sunday-School of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Canton February 19, 1882.

Whereas, after an illness of some weeks, FELIX M. BALDWIN, a member of our Sabbath School, departed this life on [illegible] ult, and

Whereas, we as a body, desire to give some expression [illegible] in respect to our sad bereavement therein—

Resolved, that we feel we have had an exemplification of two prominent scriptural facts, in the death of our little friend, viz: that life even in the young, the healthy, and the strong is uncertain; and, that "death aims its shafts at shining marks."

Resolved, that while we humbly submit ourselves to this dispensation of God's Providence, we deeply deplore our loss: for in Felix Baldwin, this school had a member of whom it could well be proud; gifted in mind, amiable in disposition unexceptionably pure in heart we had a right to expect him to be at no distant day an honor to himself and to our school.

Resolved That we tender his bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy.

THE CELESTIAL CITY.

Far away beyond the river,
The celestial city lies,
Hailed in light and robed in glory,
Never seen by mortal eyes.
Gates of pearl of snowy whiteness,
Left by angel hands ajar,
Walls of jasper set with jewels,
Each aglow as 'twere a star.

There is built the royal palace,
There is set Messiah's throne:
No sunlight there nor moonlight—
Its light the Holy One;
There the angels ever worship,
And unite in holy song,
And the ceaseless tide of music
Rolls the golden streets along.

There martyrs and confessors
Wear the crown and bear the palm,
And ever chant the triumphs
Of Christ, the martyr Lamb;
And there in purest raiment—
Raiment purified by blood—
Near the throne and by the altar
Stand the "royal priests" of God.

There is set the Marriage Supper—
Feast of joy and feast of love—
While the covenant arch of emerald
Glows the festal scene above;
And they who have been bidden
To the Lamb's own festal board,
Take the "new wine of the kingdom"
In the presence of their Lord.

O City of Salvation!
We would thy glory see,
And share the blessed franchise
That makes thy children free.
O Jesus, King of Zion!
Come seal us as thine own;
Give us each a grand translation
From thy footstool to thy throne.

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

My Dear Young Friends of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South: During my visit to America in 1880-81, I found a great many people, and especially young people, who wanted to know more of that land called China, and the people who live in that country. Now, that I have returned to my home and work in this far-away heathen land, I propose to tell you, in a plain and simple way, something of the country, the people, their manners and customs, and of their gross superstition and idolatry.

You will find as you follow me, that this people, though they live in a land of plenty and a land of inexhaustible resources, they are not a truly happy people, as we, who are Christians, would call happiness. Old and young are alike in spiritual darkness. Fathers, mothers, sons and daughters are without a knowledge of God, are in bondage to the dead, and bow down to dumb idols. They have no Bible, no churches and no Sabbath, except what the missionary has brought to them. But I will tell you more of that as I proceed, and I hope to tell you how God has blessed the work of his servants, the missionaries, who have come to this land to tell this people of the love of Jesus.

The country in which you live is one upon which God has smiled, and abounds in the richest gifts of nature—fruits and flowers, beautiful groves and vast forests, fertile plains and majestic rivers. No one could wish for a more delightful country in which to live. In China we find that God has blessed the land with the same rich display of nature. But there is one great difference between the people of Christian America and the people of heathen China. I want you to follow us as we talk of China and her people, and I am quite sure you will feel a deeper interest in the history and in the spiritual welfare of these people who have no knowledge of God and have been for ages worshipers of dumb idols.

The people of China are not as savages who have no houses, and who live in dens and caves, or stretch themselves upon the ground, when night overtakes them, with no bed but the bare earth. No; the Chinese have homes, and are, in a certain sense, a civilized people. If you will read the history of the aborigines of California, you will see that you have savages in you own country far below the Chinese. You will find from their history that when they had satisfied their hunger or thirst, they would for days lie upon the ground like the beasts of the field. I believe the Chinese have such savages in Formosa and in the mountains of the west; but they are far removed from the homes of the civilized Chinese. When you know something of the character of these people, and how depraved and wicked they are, because they have not the gospel, you will then be more able to appreciate the benefits of a Christian civilization and the blessings resulting from the worship of a true God.

China, you know, is in the eastern part of Asia. It is the most extensive empire in the world, and has a population of nearly four hundred millions. China proper is divided into eighteen providences, while she has outlying dependencies—Mongolia, Turkistan, Thibet and Manchuria—extending over an immense area of country from north to south, while her coast line is about three thousand miles. The largest river is the Yangtsz-klang (son of the ocean), being thirty-three hundred miles in length, and draining a basin of eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles, in which dwell a population of one hundred and eighty millions.

The empire of China is now ruled by the Tartars, and has been for two hundred and fifty years. The emperor is of a Manchu family, but his empire is called the Chinese empire. The young emperor is at this time only ten years of age. A very old lady is the empress regent, and is nominally at the head of this great empire; but Prince Kung is the chief ruling spirit.

The name China is derived from the "Tsin" family, who were the ruling family two hundred and fifty years before the Christian era. We call them Chinese; but they do not know that name, but give themselves other very high-sounding names. I will give you some of these names below. In speaking of their country they say the "middle kingdom," because they think it the middle and best part of the earth. They call it the "flowery" or "glorious land." They speak of it as "all under heaven," as if there were no other country but theirs. They also say, "within the four seas," as if it was surrounded by water. China is also called "Far Cathay," and the "land of Sinim." (See Isaiah xlix, 12.) They also give their country the high-sounding name of "celestial empire," and the emperor is called the "son of heaven," and the people think he is appointed by heaven.

China is a vast country, comprising within her territory every variety of climate. There is also in this country one of the largest deserts known, and yet her plains are as fertile as any part of the whole world. There are many large rivers which drain and irrigate all the low lands. The yellow river called "China's sorrow" is three times the length of the Ohio, and her largest river, the Yangtsz-Kiang, is said to be longer than the Mississippi. In the central part of China there are many canals, and, as the land is very fertile, the people produce everything that can be grown in America and Europe. Her coal mines are very extensive, and are said to be more than twenty times greater than those of the whole of Europe. Her iron mines are also very extensive. There are gold and silver mines in the north and central parts of this great empire, as well as lead and copper. These mines are now being worked on the most improved style. You can have all kinds of climate and altitudes, from the southern seashore to the highest mountains three thousand miles north where there is perpetual snow. When the streams of Peking are frozen over, you find the thermometer at Canton seldom lower than fifty degrees. These people could not be starved were even the nations of the earth to surround them with an armed force. There is nothing that grows in any part of the earth that does not or would not flourish in China.

This empire of China is one-third of the whole continent of Asia, and one-tenth of the whole habitable globe, running through about seventy degrees of latitude and forty of longitude, and is half the circuit of the globe. It is almost impossible for us to conceive of the extent of this great empire without making some comparison. How few persons realize its extent! China proper, that is, the eighteen provinces, is about as large as eighteen of our largest States, while the whole empire of China is larger than the whole continent of Europe. It is richer in agricultural products and richer in mineral resources. The whole of China is more than eighteen times larger than the British Islands. It is one hundred and four times larger than England, and nearly one hundred and eighty times larger than Scotland. If you could place the whole of Europe in China, there would be thirteen hundred square miles of that great country uncovered. China is one-third larger than all Europe. If you take China and her dependencies and place them in the United States, it would extend into the Gulf of Mexico and about four degrees into the Pacific ocean. If you take the United States, including Alaska, and place them in China, you would have to add half a dozen of Great Britain and Ireland to fill all the vacant space.

I will write you again in a short time concerning China and her people.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, Jan. 21, 1882.

Three Recent Earthquakes.

Three earthquakes occurred in Europe in 1881-82. That of Agram, though it sufficed to damage, more or less, every building in the town, having left scarcely a chimney standing, caused but slight loss of life. The town stands in the flat alluvial valley of the Save, a likely spot. Near the town crevices were opened in the ground, one of them three miles long. The shock was felt to the north at Vienna and at Debreczin, and to the south as far as Istria.

Few places in Europe have been so haunted by subterranean movements from the earliest time as the isle of Ischia. Homer, Pindar and Virgil have in turn celebrated its throes, which they attributed to the struggles of the giant Typhœus, whom Jupiter had imprisoned by clapping the mountain Inarime (now Epomeo) upon his body, lest as he had secured another revolutionary Titan, Enceladus, under Etna. Desiring to relieve himself from the restraint of his uneasy couch, durum cubile as Virgil styles it, we may suppose the giant to be the author of the commotion of March last, which shook all the south side of the island. Reverting to the sober history of Ischia, we have continued records of convulsions from the days of Strabo and Pliny onwards. Indeed, not until A. D. 1300 did Epomeo, the crest and center of the island, cease to pour forth lava and ashes, though now ranking among distinct volcanoes. The island has not escaped without a shock occurring nearly every year; but few have attained the severity of that of March 4, 1881, which concentrated its violence on the town of Casa Micciola, shaking down great parts of its houses over the heads of the inhabitants, with great loss of life. So sudden was the catastrophe, that the body of a cobbler was dug out from the ruins, with his last between his knees, and that of a woman, with the stocking she was knitting upon her hand. The part of the island exclusively affected, consists of enormously thick beds of clay, similar to those over which the Campanian earthquake wreaked its ravages.

What specially distinguishes Ischia is the development of internal heat in those parts where the earthquake prevailed. Nowhere within so limited a space are there so many, or such intensely hot mineral springs, whose waters are in part used for the cure of maladies, while the rest goes to scald pigs and wash clothes. Indeed, in this part of the island there seems to be no cold water whatever. The soil is hot, the dry sand on the seashore is hot, and the earth breathes out from its crevices jets of intensely hot air, which is used medically for stufe or air-baths. Such copious emanations of heat, gas and scalding water, indicating as they do a direct opening or communication with the interior of the earth, favorable to the discharge of electric energy, all combine to characterize Ischia as a very hot-bed of the earthquake.

The rich and lovely island of Chio, the scene of the third great earthquake, which began April 3, 1881, though standing upon the belt of subterranean commotion we have mentioned, had not been subject in recent times to very serious tremors. It does not appear in Dr. Schmidt's Catalogue before 1859. The shock of the third was repeated on the eleventh of April, with such tremendous force, as to overthrow what had been spared on the third. The ground swayed and rocked under it, shuffling the ruined walls to and fro, throwing them on the side opposite to that in which they first fell. Indeed, there are instances of a second shock uncovering and releasing those buried under fallen houses at first, and allowing them to escape from their prison. Not until the twentieth did the surface quiet down. In that time some 4,000 persons perished; from 8,000 to 10,000 were more or less maimed, and from 30,000 to 40,000 rendered houseless. Out of 250 shocks between the third and twelfth, the intelligent correspondent of the Daily News tells us, 40 were capable of overthrowing a well-built house, but vibrations continued until June 13, when a shock threw down a Turkish minaret and a tower-down a Turkish minaret and a tower-ding will. In the town of Chio the old fortress is utterly prostrated, but viewed from the streets, many houses present their usual appearance, the fronts standing although the interior is down. The scene of this fearful and distressing catastrophe was the south-east corner of the island, consisting, as usual, of modern alluvial and slightly coherent deposits. Here the devastation of 12 out of a total of 75 villages occurred. The central strip, or backbone of the island, of old limestone, sandstone and slate, scarcely suffered at all. The physical aspect of the country is unaltered, and, though the opposite coasts—Smyrna, Mytilene, etc.—were affected, the statement that the sea-bed between was raised is simply unfounded.—London Quarterly Review.

Religious Intelligence.

MISSIONARY.

—On the question of self-support the Rev. John H. Wyckoff, of the Reformed Mission in Indiana, has something of value to say. He explains that, as everybody knows, the greatest hindrance comes from the fact that the majority of the converts are Pariahs or outcasts, who have no lands or money and are shut out of many kinds of employment. "There is no doubt," he says, "that the conversion of the Pariahs and other low castes has had the effect of repelling the high-caste Hindus from Christianity." If the work of conversion had begun among the higher castes, the Native Church would have become self-supporting long ago; but he is not sorry that it is otherwise, for, if the higher castes had been the first to accept the gospel, "the result would have been that the renunciation of caste would not have been made a practical test of admission into the church, as it now is, for there would be no lower castes in the church for them to associate with and caste, with its terrible evils, would thus have found its way into the Church of Christ. The vast gulf which separates the high from the low castes would, consequently, have been widened, and the result would be the virtual exclusion of the latter from the church altogether. We can, therefore, I think, see that it is better that the work has begun as the manner that it has, from the lower classes upward; and, although the Native Church may be longer dependent on the liberality of Christians in America, still she is more firmly established, her members will be stronger and holier, and the spirit of unity and brotherly love which they exhibit will be a continual rebuke to the proud caste spirit of the heathen." In time the repugnance which high-caste Hindus show to Christianity, and gradually the church, by its growing intelligence, will bridge the chasm between the Brahmin and the Pariah. The outlook, Mr. Wyckoff thinks, in common with many others, is very encouraging. He says:

"Our Christians are improving in every way. Slowly, to be sure; but this is to be expected. They are growing in intelligence. The boarding schools have given us a large number of educated young men and women, who are scattered around in different parts of the district, inciting an influence for good. The station and village schools have taught hundreds of children to read, and there is thus growing up a generation far in advance of the preceding one in point of intelligence. With the spread of education, here naturally must be an advance socially. The term of reproach, 'Christian' or which is the same things 'Pariah,' is no longer used as it formerly was. Christians are beginning to be recognized as a class distinct from and far superior to the Pariahs. They attend the same schools and sit at the same bench with Brahmins and are treated with all the respect they deserve. Families of different villages are intermarrying and the Christian family is being developed in the mission, while Christians in all parts of the district are becoming united to one another by ties of relationship. I can see also a growth in Christian character. A higher tone of morality is beginning to pervade our churches. Conscience is more active, repentance and sorrow for sin more real, while there are not a few examples of deep piety. . . . Everywhere throughout the mission the people are learning that it is more blessed to give than to receive and are making contributions toward the support of their pastors. What they give is little, to be sure, and does not yet relieve the funds of the board; but the spirit of giving is taking hold, of them and is increasing. I could mention notable examples of liberality but this is not the time to do it. Nor is the advance in self-government less marked. Formerly the missionary was required to do everything. Now there are native pastors, catechists, and elders, to whom he can intrust a good part of his work, and he is able to superintend a large district, because of the executive power and good judgment the native brethren possess."—New York Independent.

—A missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the gospel in Ahmednagur, India, says that on a visit to Kukana recently he saw at the Government school three Mahar boys, with books and slates, sitting outside the door of the school, listening and looking in, to learn all they could of what the teacher was saying. This, he says, is not an infrequent sight. He could not but be affected to think how these despised boys were content to be treated like dogs if only they could gather up a few scraps of knowledge. The teacher, a Brahman, was willing, he said, to take the boys inside, and did so, at the request of the missionary; but in two or three days they were turned out again, because the people of the village would not permit Mahars to sit with their children.

—The English Baptist missionaries have established their first station on the Congo River, at Manyanga, at Ntombe Falls. No difficulty was met with from the chiefs in securing a site. The mission premises adjoin those of the Belgian Expedition. It is regarded as indispensable to the occupation of Stanley Pool to establish this depot. The people are quiet and inoffensive and readily make friends with the missionaries. No one made the least objection to the settlement of the missionaries. The latter are waiting for the steamer which their English friends are to send them, for use on the river.

—The Protestant Episcopal Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews continues to work actively throughout the country, having branches in twenty-six dioceses and five missionary jurisdictions. Last year the society issued 20,000 copies of publications and distributed the scriptures and prayer-books in various languages. The missionary school in New York City had 78 children of the well-to-do class. The missionary had fifty-six inquirers under instruction. Three were baptized and eight are preparing for baptism and five for confirmation. A missionary school has been started in Baltimore. The whole number admitted to baptism, so far, is stated at over a hundred. The income of the society for the year was $8,018.

—Rev. Henry M. Ladd, superintendent of the African missions of the A. M. A., will start for the White Nile, in Central Africa, early in September, for the purpose of locating the Arthington mission. He expects to be accompanied by Dr. E. E. Snow, of Walton, N. Y., and two colored missionaries. They will proceed as early as possible to Khartoum, at which point it is probable they will be obliged to secure private conveyance to the mouth of the Sobat and beyond. A part of the company will remain at a suitable location to study the language of the tribes where it is decided to locate the mission, while others will return to secure such facilities and reinforcements as may be needful to place the mission on a working basis.

—The rascally slave-traders of East Africa recently demolished the house and destroyed the books and papers of the Rev. W. P. Johnson, of the Universities' Mission, in Mataka's Town. Mr. Johnson was away on an exploring expedition on Lake Shirwan when the outrage was committed. He was compelled to go to Zanzibar for a new supply. He will settle on the eastern shore of Lake Nyassa, in a place called Losewa, whence he will visit Mataka's Town.

—The Episcopal Church has twenty-four missionaries among the Indians, and twenty-five among twenty-four times as many colored people. This church is beginning to comprehend that in regard to this race, which now numbers over 6,000,000, it is not at all doing its duty.

—The Congregationalists contemplate the establishment of two schools of a higher grade in Spain. One will be for the training of young women, the other for educating young men to become evangelists.

—The estimated value of the lands, buildings, chapels, printing presses, etc., held by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church for the use of its missions in heathen lands is $577,810.

—The contributions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for missions the past year advanced 100 per cent. on those of the preceding year.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—A private meeting has been held in Edinburgh of members of the Traditional Party in the Free Church of Scotland to consider what ought to be done with regard to Prof. Bruce's book on "The Chief End of Revelation." Prof. Thomas Smith, Dr. Begg, and seventy other persons were present. The Scotsman understands that "some of the speakers were disparing in their condemnation of the views embodied in Prof. Bruce's book, while others were in the position of not having read or sufficiently studied the volume to offer any opinion regarding the doctrines contained in it." Mr. Kidston stated that he should ask the commission of the assembly if the college committee had taken any action yet. The feeling of the Conference was in favor of letting the Glasgow Presbytery take the initiative.

—A remarkable story comes from Quebec about arrangements in process there to offer the Pope an asylum. It is said the Canadian prelates and prominent lay Catholics are in Conference and have corresponded with Leo XIII, who has described in a long letter the difficulties of his position in Rome and acknowledged that the removal of the Papal chair from the capital of Italy is a problem to which he and the Sacred College have been giving their earnest attention. The dispatch intimates that the Pope's letter has given much encouragement to the promoters of the scheme, who are about to communicate with leading Irish Bishops and with the hierarchy of the United States and raise a large fund of money. There has been no confirmation of this report.—New York Independent.

—The question of excluding members of secret societies from the communion of the Reformed (Dutch) Church was, it will be remembered, earnestly discussed in the General Synod, two or three years ago, and some dissatisfaction was caused by the refusal to make the matter a test of membership. The western classes seem to be very decided in their opposition to secret societies. A dispatch from Detroit states that a majority of the members of the First Church of that city have seceded, and amid the disturbance which occurred the mayor read the Riot Act and caused the crowd to disperse.

—The Master-General of the Dominicans has issued a circular commending the work of the Society of the Holy Infancy, which in less than forty years baptized 500,000 infants and placed 80,000 in orphan asylums. Every year, he says, "by means of this infantile apostolate, a vast number of children, snatched from eternal death, are sent to heaven to complete the number of the elect, whose pure and innocent legions, by their number and stainless beauty, constitute the most resplendent trophy of the church Militant."

—There has been a division in the camp of the Salvation Army and the result is a Hallelujah Army in Ireland, with "General" Gault for its leader. It has a footing in seven or eight towns. Its head-quarters are in Ballymena, the place where the memorable revival of 1859 originated, and it issues a weekly paper. Gault professes merely to assist the existing churches to carry on their work. If a sectarian object were avowed the movement would soon die out, and yet the real object is sectarian.—Christian Union.

—The Metropolitan Methodist Church of Washington is not a local, but a national organization, in which it is sought to interest the whole Methodist Episcopal Church. For some years it has been carrying a heavy debt. A year ago this encumbrance amounted to $12,000. It has all been paid now but $17,700, which Chaplin McCabe, of the Church Extension Society, has assumed and will ere long collect.

—The Salvation Army, according to "General" Booth, has 265 stations now, against 36 last year. It has 385 paid officers and an income of $288,000 a year. More than half of the $100,000 required for the purchase of Congress Hall, at Clapton, has been secured and 9,000,000 copies of Salvation literature were distributed last year.

—In Munich, South Germany, the Chambers have carried a motion by 81 to 60 votes for the abolition of undenominational schools. One of the speakers said these schools were supported by all atheists, and champions of modern revolution and were hot-beds of unbelief.

—Prince Leopold is Vice-President of the Church of England Temperance Society, and takes a deep interest in the progress of the movement.

A KISS FOR A BLOW.

BY MINNIE A. PERHAM.

A brother and sister, one bright, pleasant day,
In their own little chamber were busy at play;
They played very kindly, no cross words were said
Till Bessie took something belonging to Fred.

"You give that to me right away!" Freddie cried;
And to pull it away very harshly he tried.
But Bessie held fast, and she pleasantly said,
"If you'll only say please you may have it, dear Fred."

But Fred was not conquered; he would not do so;
He struck little Bessie a very hard blow,
And sullenly muttered, "There, now, I'll have this;"
But Bessie went to him and gave him a kiss.

Poor Fred felt ashamed, and he gave her his toy,
And then crept away like a shamed little boy.
If again he is tempted to strike Bessie so,
Let us hope he'll remember a kiss for a blow.

An Out-of-the-Way Dog.

BY J. T. HOBSHEGA.

He is a delightful dog in every respect, and I am very proud of my acquaintance with him; for he is not only uncommon himself but he lives in a most uncommon place. I suppose he would be just as clever and handsome if he dwelt on the main-land, as most dogs do, but in that case he could never lead the romantic and interesting life that he does on his island. It is such a little island, too, right out in the middle of Long Island Sound, with its big lighthouse to warn vessels off the dangerous rocks which lie beyond. It looks rather lonely, seen from a distance, standing there all by itself, way out at sea; but when you get there you find it is not lonely at all, for the pleasant family who keep the light are very fond of animals, and own a number of charming ones, and animals, I think, make almost any place cheerful and home-like; and then the island itself is so pleasant, with its pretty house overshadowed by the tall, white tower. Trees do not grow very well there, owing to the hard, rocky bottom, but there are plenty of vines, and bright sweet-smelling flowers and green grass, while on every side stretches the broad expanse of the blue sea, with the white sails flitting by and the faint line of the shore in the distance. I have only been there in summer, but I should imagine that it must be quite as beautiful, in a different way, in the cold icy winter, although then the family are often cut off from any communication with the shore for weeks at a time. I believe they like the winter best themselves; they seem to have so many resources.

Captain B. has a very fine collection of stuffed birds, all of which have been shot on the island and stuffed by himself. Often-times after a severe storm they find hundreds of little birds who have been dashed against the tower in the night and killed, attracted thither by the light. Then they have lovely shells and mosses, and sea curiosities of all sorts; their arrangement showing great skill and ingenuity. So much for my friend Tiger's surroundings. Do you wonder that he is a happy dog, living in such a delightful and unusual place? Then for companions he has the chickens and ducks, a few comfortable looking sheep, and the dear tame donkey, who is also a great friend of mine. Inside the house is the queer flying-squirrel, the white mice, the cross parrot, who is only polite to her mistress, and last, but by no means least, the big tortoise-shell cat, "Missy," who is herself the heroine of a thrilling story. She belonged to the captain of a brig bound for the West Indies, which was wrecked on the treacherous reef a number of years ago. This wise captain refused to abandon the ship without saving his cat, whom he entreated the young ladies to take care of for him. She was at first loth to abandon her sea-faring life, and did not quite approve of the stationary island, but now she is devoted to her adopted home. She is a very interesting and peculiar cat, but as Tiger is the real hero of this sketch I must not linger any longer over Missy's charms.

Tiger should be seen to be appreciated. His beauty is quite remarkable. He is very large and black, with the whitest of shirt fronts, and the most loving, intelligent eyes that ever shone out of a dog's face. He is a little vain, I think; but what wonder! In the summer, when crowds of people visit the island, he receives flattery and attention enough to turn an ordinary dog's head. You should see the affected position which he assumes, sitting in his own particular chair, with his paws gracefully crossed on one arm, and the most satisfied complacent look on his face, as if he said, "How you must admire me!"

But the funniest thing is to hear him sing! Tiger loves music, but like all musicians he is not always in the performing mood. Sometimes he has colds. I heard him sing "Greenville" last summer, his master accompanying him on the flageolet. He sat perfectly upright, with his eyes fixed intently on the instrument, and, sang with all his heart, keeping excellent time with the music. His low moans when the music was soft, and loud barks where the air seemed to demand them were indescribably funny. When he had finished he looked around at us, and smiled and wagged his tail, as if he felt he had done himself justice that time. Tiger simply adores his master, whose slightest word is law. The captain sends him on all manner of errands, up-stairs and out of doors. It is certain that Tiger perfectly understands everything that is said to him; he listens intently to his master's directions and commands, as if so anxious to comprehend, then with a bright wag of his tail off he runs to return immediately with the desired article. He never disobeys. I saw him refuse a piece of cake once last summer, which he wanted tremendously, because his master said in a low, quiet voice, "Don't take the next piece, Tiger."

His mistress pressed it on him most urgently; but no, Tiger was resolute. He even refused to look at it, but kept his beseeching eyes fixed on his master's face until he gave the desired permission to take the tempting morsel. Tiger thinks he is the only dog who has a right to live. This is the result of his secluded life. He has no idea of the big world which lies beyond his island home, and of the vast number of dogs of high and low degree who dwell there and are obliged to put up with each other. It infuriates him beyond measure when, on rare occasions, a dog is brought on to the island. He is very powerful, and would kill them immediately if allowed to. Once went there with a friend who had with her her little pet dog. What a scene of confusion ensued when Tiger discovered the presence of this little interloper! He was conveyed, in disgrace, up-stairs to his mistress's room, where he was talked to solemnly and gravely about his awful display of temper. He wanted to feel sorry, but he could not. He kept coming to the window and looking anxiously out, giving vent to sharp angry barks expressive of his entire disapproval.

Many people have asked for pictures of Tiger, but Captain B. tells me that he has found it impossible to have his picture taken. He becomes so excited by the unusual sights and sounds which he has to encounter on the way to the photographer's that he almost goes crazy; so now he never leaves his beloved island. Perhaps some time an artist will go there and transfer Tiger's magnificent beauty to paper. I am sure it would give his many friends great pleasure. But a picture, however beautiful, would only show half Tiger—the least admirable half; and one feel that my words fail to do his character justice. He is of the "Bravo Bobby" class of dog. We have all read about him in our reading books. I can remember shedding bitter tears over his sad fate when I was a little girl at school.

Every summer when I go to my seashore home I sail over to the island and renew my friendship with Tiger, and often in the long winter evenings, when the snow is falling fast or the wind howling fiercely outside, my fancy reverts to the little island standing so bravely out there at sea, with its bright lamp always burning to warn the poor sailors of danger near; and then I imagine Tiger to be lying cosily in front of the fire in the pleasant sitting-room, turning his loving eyes now and then to his master's face, or following that master up the steep stairway of the light-house tower to see that all is right. Of course Tiger does not keep the light, but he feels as if he had all the responsibility of it, and, I have no doubt, considers himself of vast importance to the Government.

Maybe some of you will one day sail to this little island and see this "out-of-the-way dog," Tiger, and you will see the donkey, and Missy, and the cross parrot, and all the other charming sights of this delightful spot. Then you will know that my story is quite true.—Christian Union.

SEWING ACHES.—Jessie sat down by her mother to sew. She was making a pillow case for her own little pillow.

"Ah! this?" she asked in a discontented tone, holding the seam out.

"That is not too much for a little girl who has a work basket of her own," said her mother. "Yes," thought Jessie, "mother has given me a work basket, and I ought to be willing to sew;" and with that she took a few stitches quite diligently.

"I have a dreadful pain at my side," said Jessie, in a few minutes. "My thumb is very sore," she said a few moments after. "Oh, my hand is so tired!" was the next. Next there was something the matter with her foot, and then with her eyes, and so she was full of trouble. At length the sewing was done. Jessie brought it to her mother.

"Should I not first send for a doctor?" said her mother.

"The doctor for me, mother?" cried the little girl, as surprised as she could be.

"Certainly. A little girl so full of pains and aches must be sick; and the sooner we have the doctor, the better."

"O mother!" said Jessie, laughing, "they were sewing aches. I am well now."

I have heard of other little girls besides Jessie who had sewing aches and pains whenever their parents had any work for them to do. This is a disease called "selfishness;" and I hope none of my little readers are afflicted with it.—Baptist Weekly.

Bits from the Animal Kingdom.

A writer in St. Nicholas, says: "'Taming' is a process which has to be constantly renewed, for the tamest tiger is a tiger still, and there has been no change in his born conviction that all other living creatures are 'game' for him. The best lion and tiger 'kings' of to-day say that every time they enter a cage containing these fierce creatures, they carry their lives in their hands."

A dog that hears through an ear trumpet and wears spectacles, belongs to Patrick Nichols, of Milwaukee, Wis. This animal is said to be thirty-five years of age, and has lost his hearing and sight, and his master, for many years of fidelity, procured these aids to cheer him. A set of artificial teeth is also being made for him.

Nemo was a handsome pony belonging to an old negro woman in St. Louis. She had become very aged, and seemed serious and meditative. With a few farewell neighs recently, she deliberately dashed her head against the wall of the house, and breaking her neck, died.

In the north of Scotland an eagle carried a cat to her nest. Feigning death the cat was left by the eagle with her young ones. As soon as the old bird left, pussy sprang upon the eaglets, made a meal of one of them, and effected her escape without injury.

A little daughter of Charles Neubertz, of Wyandotte, Mo., found a nest of quails' eggs, and placed them in a cornucopia in the house. A few days later it was discovered that some of the eggs had hatched, and the quails were in the act of breaking their shells.

There are some twenty-five varieties of owls in America, ranging in size from the diminutive pigmy, which is the smallest of the species, to the great gray owl or cinereous owl.

A squirrel, killed while stealing wheat from a warehouse on the San Joaquin River, was found to have 1,800 grains of the cereal stowed away in his mouth.

Insects are proportionally stronger than animals. A cockchafer can draw a load fourteen times greater than his body; a bee twenty times; an ant thirty times.

Spiders have been seen as small as a grain of sand, and these spin a thread so fine that it takes four thousand of them put together to equal in size a single hair.

Sir John Lubbock, says, that bees are, in some degree, sensitive to color, and that their favorite color is blue.

BE KIND TO MOTHER.

Children, make your mother happy,
Make her sing instead of sigh,
For the mournful harp of putting
May be very, very nigh.

Children, make your mother happy;
Many griefs she has to bear;
And she wearies 'neath her burdens—
Can you not these burdens share.

A Religious Tonic.

We refer especially to the regular weekly prayer meeting. The spiritual strength needs this stimulating and nourishing means of grace. The soul, like the body, becomes enfeebled, gets under par, and must be braced up. There are sickly and wan souls, little better than spiritual cadavers, that need the prayer meeting to arouse the torpid faculties, and to promote the healthful and vigorous processes of spiritual life.

As between means and means, no comparison need be drawn, whether the class meeting or the prayer meeting, or private and family prayer, be the most important. They are each and all vital to the Christian's well-being. The prayer meeting, however, is public and social worship, and serves purposes, and secures blessings, that can not well be realized in any other way. The communion of saints is actual and concrete in the prayer meeting, and the vigor nourished in it flows out into every other form of devotion.

We imagine the spiritual pulse of members of the church always tells whether they are habitually present at the prayer meeting. It is a privilege which all can not enjoy, and in such cases God may make up the loss in some other way. But usually where, by no fault of our own, we are without the opportunity there are signs of inadequate nutrition. The individual and the church suffer. They may live, but they can not flourish as they would if the mid-week hour of social prayer were observed. The large Scriptural lesson, and the brief and practical exposition, usually afford more solid food to the heart-hungry than does the eloquent topical sermon of the Sabbath; and the informal talks of the brethren and sisters, in the way of experience and exhortation, are helpful and edifying. And the singing. Well, the prayer meeting is the last stronghold and citadel of hearty and spiritual song. It is, or ought to be, the singing-school of the church—this and the Sunday-school; and, in both, their capability for usefulness in this respect, is not fully developed. For one thing, the Sunday-school songs are not generally adapted to congregational uses; and the tendency, in the modern prayer meeting, is to depend upon an instrument and a single leader. We do not pronounce against the cabinet organ in the prayer meeting, but it has occurred to us that the exclusive use of it has affected the old-time spontaneity and heartiness of the singing. Volunteer singing has its perils and infelicities, but it also has the advantage of variety, and of more fully expressing the feelings and needs of a social assembly.

We would exclude neither, but mix them in due measure, and thus, if possible, develop singing, the art of selecting hymns and raising tunes, as an important devotional element. We think we have observed that our prayer meeting people are less familiar with our hymns than was the case twenty-five years ago. Now the hymn must be announced, or few can unite in singing it. Our grand old hymns are not held in the memory, and lively and appropriate snatches of song are becoming more and more impracticable. We verily believe our prayer meetings would be improved by cultivating more this spontaneity in singing, and by returning to the old hymns that have, in other days, done so much for the power and spirituality of Methodism. At any rate, the tonic effects of a prayer meeting depend greatly upon the singing, the style of it, the adaptation, the heartiness and the spirituality of it.

The prayer meeting surely doeth good, like a medicine. It restores to sickly souls the healthful circulation, brings back the glow of buoyant hope, and drives out encroaching worldliness and spiritual indifference. Not only is it a remedy, but it is also a preventive. It is the refuge of the tired and care-burdened, and a restorative to the soul in the midst of the exhausting influences of the crazed and dissipating spirit of mammon and pleasure. A tonic taken in time may fortify the body against malaria, and ward off fatal inroads of disease. The prayer meeting is a fountain of health to the soul, antagonizing the subtle and deadly poisons of sin and unbelief, and building up a robust spirituality which can defy the assaults of temptation.

The prayer meeting draws the line between the sick and the well; between those who languish, dwindle, and have fallen into spiritual decline, and those who are sound and strong in the faith and in the statutes of God. The Christian who would live and not die must resort to this place of healing. He needs the tonic properties of this social worship, its health-giving and health-conserving virtue.

Protest Against Persecution.

On Thursday night, March 16, a public meeting was held at Grunewald Hall, in this city, to utter a protest against the cruel persecution which the Jews are suffering in Russia. There was a large attendance of people of all creeds, suitable resolutions were adopted, and addresses made by distinguished speakers. Such meetings have been held in other large cities of the United States, and we believe also in Great Britain.

The civilized world has been horrified, and aroused to a high pitch of indignation, by the almost unparalleled atrocities committed in Russia by popular uprisings against the Jews, and in regard to which the Russian government has been silent and seemingly indifferent. Persecution, on account of race or religion, is utterly abhorrent to the convictions and feelings of our people. If men are guilty of crime, and deserving of punishment, let them suffer in accordance with law and justice; but persecution, inflicted by the blind fury of mob violence, or by a despotic government, must arouse in every Christian heart the deepest detestation and the severest censure. In the resolutions of sympathy adopted at the meeting are these words:

We have no disposition to interfere with the internal administration of foreign countries, but we cannot forget that the idea of government implies the supremacy of justice; it implies the shelter of the helpless from brute force and blind passion by the strong arm of law, if they have offended it, to the Jews. In the present case the civilized world is shocked to see them without even the pretense of a trial or legal accusation, abandoned to the lawless fury of the mob. This is a fatal blow to that spirit of equity and charity, which is the peculiar badge of that Christianity which Russia professes in common with ourselves.

Therefore, in the name of humanity, in the name of justice and in the name of Christianity, we do solemnly protest against a system of outrages, such as is without parallel in modern history.

We cordially indorse the prompt humanity of Gov. McEnery in offering to the exiles homesteads in Louisiana.

We approve the policy of establishing agricultural colonies for their relief. The success which has attended the colony already planted in this State is, we trust, a pledge of the entire success of this scheme of relief.

The disastrous inundation of the Mississippi Valley is now pressing heavily upon the resources of this community, yet we believe that many of our citizens will cheerfully contribute to the relief of this stricken people in their hour of need. We therefore recommend that his Honor the Mayor appoint a committee to receive and disburse such contributions.

We also request our members of Congress to lay before the President this expression of the sentiment of our citizens, with a view to such action as may more effectively conduce to the relief of the sufferers.

Rev. B. M. Palmer, D. D., one of the speakers, expressed the convictions which prevail in every enlightened Christian community. As reported in the Picayune, Dr. Palmer said:

When we read the accounts of the Jewish persecutions the eye involuntary glances up to the top of the page to ascertain the date, wondering if we have not stumbled on some chronicle of the Middle Ages, when men thought to do God a service by dragging men and women to prison for opinion's sake. When you realized that those atrocities were perpetrated in May, June, July, 1881, your spontaneous wish was to obey the call that brings us together, that we may catch that wail of distress as it booms across the waters, and return a response in language as emphatic as can be conceived, expressing our abhorrence of oppression and wrong. If you have not read the accounts of these outrages, I have to say it is impossible to put them in any form of speech to be uttered before a public audience. It may be said in general that three millions of people have been rendered homeless, and driven out as wanderers on the face of the land in which they were born. Many towns have been pillaged and every species of barbarity perpetrated. I could tell also of property seized, and of hundreds of thousands of Jews reduced from comparative competency to extreme want. It is not requisite that we should go into a detailed account of these outrages, accounts of which make the ears tingle. It has been alleged that these persecutions were only outbursts of irresponsible Russian mobs, but the proof has been presented to you to night that the Russian Government has stood silent in the presence of all these outrages. It was well known that these persecutions would not be offensive to those in authority. The authorities and soldiers themselves not only failed to interpose the protection of the law, but abused their office by assisting in the pillage and the acts of oppression. We are constrained to hold the Russian Government and people responsible for these wrongs. I hope to have your concurrence in the sentiment that these outrages are aggravated by the cowardice which has accompanied them. They have not been done in a corner, but in one of the first nations of Europe, with power to enforce the law wherever it is determined that it shall be obeyed. Yet, the constituted authorities screen themselves behind an irresponsible mob. Cruelty is all the worse when united to treachery and meanness.

It has been asked "What is the use of this meeting in a far off land?" I do not know that, in a question of morals we are to raise this question of utility. There are times when the human heart must, like a canyon, receive the sounds poured into it, and return an echo in protest and remonstrance.

I insist upon it that ideas rule the world. My reading of history satisfied me that of all things that are weak the weakest is physical force when it is opposed to moral force. In the age in which we live ideas and principles must rule.

The man who thinks, and who is able to articulate his thought is the true monarch. The protests that go up from America and England will swell until they fill the world, and all the pride of the empire will bow to the expression of public opinion. I desire to enforce the idea announced by Mr. Semmes. America must speak, whoever else is dumb. The first pilgrims to these shores were religious exiles. I can trace my ancestry back to the second vessel that came from England to this continent. It is proper that America, the home of the oppressed, should unite her protest to the protests against these wrongs. I feel for this oppressed people because they are Jews. I read in the oldest of books that 4000 years ago they were chosen by God as his peculiar people. Their sacred records are in part mine, and from them I have drawn that religion upon which I base my hopes of eternal life beyond the grave. Their history for two thousand years has been unspeakably full of pathos, and I am free to say that wherever upon the face of the earth persecution falls upon the head of the Jew, I am prepared to stand side by side with him, and to say that with him I am a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and will bear the wrong, and suffering with him. You have been told of the rescript of the Minister of State of Russia. How coolly it not only apologizes for the oppression of the Jews, but to throw the blame upon them. There is another sentiment attributed to him which has not been quoted. The bitterness of that sentiment, if it were addressed to my race, would make my heart burn with resentment. The minister points to Europe beyond the Russian border, and says that the West is open to the Jew. Let us catch the echo of that voice and respond that every port on the eastern border of our Continent is open to the Jew, and that under the flag which waves over us, and under that Government whose foundation stone was inscribed more than 100 years ago with the inalienable rights of man to life, liberty and the pursuits of happiness—that if the Jews come they will be received.

Also let us build up in America such a sentiment in favor of religious and civil freedom that, on this continent, it shall never be possible to perpetrate such crimes as have stained the history of the Old World.

It is to be hoped that the leading governments of the world, backed by the public opinion of Christian communities, will be able to remonstrate effectually with the Russian government, and that this great offense against justice and mercy may be arrested. Into the causes of this persecution it is not needful to enter. Whatever they are, whether arising out of differences of religion, or race or other elements of antagonism, there is nothing to justify or even to palliate the indescribable barbarities that have been perpetrated toward millions of people, among whom the greatest sufferers have been helpless and inoffensive women and children. Persecution against anybody is hateful to the instincts and feelings of all good men. It is the child of bigotry, superstition, selfishness and malice, and is the foulest blot that can rest upon any people or any age. May the good time come—the Christian millennium—when it shall cease in the intercourse of all faiths, races and nationalities.

Death of Rev. Dr. Linfield.

William E. M. Linfield, D. D., died at Hazlehurst, Miss., at half-past three o'clock Thursday morning, March 16.

Dr. Linfield's health gave way about two years ago. His sight was seriously affected first, and he became totally blind some time before his death. For more than a year past he had some affection of the brain, attended with loss of memory and general impairment of mental action. There were during this time intervals in which he recognized his friends, and in which there were manifestations of his usual clearness of thought and perception. Usually, as we have been informed, he was exceedingly devotional, always quiet and easily directed, and on religious subjects less disordered than upon any other. At this writing we have no particulars of his last hours. It is probable, however, that his end was without conscious pain, and that he peacefully fell asleep in Jesus. The burning of his house, a short time ago, and the removal of himself and family to another residence, may have hastened his end; but of this we are not sure, as after the fire he did not seem to be conscious of the change.

Dr. Linfield was admitted on trial in the traveling connection, by the Alabama Conference, January, 1851. In December, 1859, he was transferred to the Louisiana Conference, and stationed at Baton Rouge. He was transferred to the Mississippi Conference in December, 1866. We are not in possession of the requisite data to give the details of his life. This will be done by some one of his brethren in the Conference to which he belonged.

He filled important appointments in the three Conferences of which he had been a member. He was a man of mark everywhere, and a preacher of remarkable gifts. He had an eloquent temperament, a marvelous vocabulary and command of language, a sprightly imagination, and considerable powers of analysis. He had much philosophic insight, a fresh and original way of putting things, and a most earnest, tender and sympathetic spirit. His preparations for the pulpit were laborious and thorough. Many of his sermons were written out in full, and in all cases copious notes were made. At about the middle period of his ministerial life we believe he often read his sermons. He had the physical endowments of an orator, a full habit, large and strong in frame and muscle, and a voice rich in every tone, and of great compass. There was music in that voice, and it was capable of expressing every shade of feeling and thought, and of thrilling an audience.

Dr. Linfield was a diligent reader and student, and possibly by overmuch study laid the foundation of disease and premature death. His earlier years in the ministry were wonderfully effective in conversions, and in some single years, in the Alabama Conference, they were numbered by the hundreds. His later ministry was less noted in this respect, but as an eloquent gospel preacher, and a favorite with the people, he had few equals up to the time that his health gave way. He had been a member of several General Conferences, and was loved and honored by his brethren. The title of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the University of Mississippi.

As a man he was without guile, child-like in his disposition and spirit, perfectly transparent, and utterly incapable of indirectness, selfishness, or any shade or hint of duplicity. With a rarely-endowed mind, he had a large and good heart. His friends in Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi are legion, and among those who enjoyed his ministry there are probably hundreds who were brought to Christ through his efforts. Our church at Baton Rouge, enlarged, reconstructed and beautified during his pastorate there, is one of many abiding monuments of his useful and devoted ministry.

W. E. M. Linfield has left upon the fields of his labor the impress of his splendid gifts, and of his untarnished and godly character. He was, in years, scarcely beyond his prime at the time of his death. His age, we suppose, was not more than fifty-five—perhaps less than this. It would seem to us that many years of active usefulness should still have remained to him. But God giveth no account of his matters. The Master does not now explain to his servants. We shall know hereafter.

"Gap-Sense."

Some time ago, while waiting in a railroad depot for a night train, this writer listened to an animated and interesting conversation between two Texans. In their free discussions of individuals and individual character one old friend was spoken of as clever and honest, but, said the speaker, "he hasn't any gap-sense." After revolving the expression in mind, vainly endeavoring to fathom its meaning, the talkative Texan was approached, and modestly asked what he meant by "gap-sense." "Well, stranger," said he, "that is a word used over in Texas among cattle men. A fellow that doesn't watch the gaps after the cattle are herded we say hasn't any gap-sense." With that explanation we thought it quite a suggestive term, and a most excellent and commendable quality. Its absence, neglect or abuse has led to extra labor and disaster in more lines of business than driving and herding cattle. Many a herdsman has lost all his labor by not providing against escape. The fatigue of to-day has to be endured again to-morrow for the simple lack of "gap-sense." The careful husbandry of the results of our labors is equally necessary with the labor itself. What advantage is all our toil if we have not the disposition or faculty to preserve its fruits? It is "gap-sense" that makes the millionaires of the world. We might have the energy of a steam engine, yet without this faculty our energies are expended in vain. Some very industrious men are never successful. They wonder why. The answer is: they are wanting in "gap-sense."

This virtue makes the successful farmer. A planter is almost invariably known by his gaps and gates. If the one is generally down, and the other rickety, he does not prosper. His cattle are out, and become the thief's prey or the coroner's victims. There is no increase. His herd has not grown any for years. Then he had a good corn prospect, but the stock destroyed it. He had a rich growth of hay, but failed to mow it at the right time. What corn he gathered and cribbed he never locked, and therefore lost. A rickety gate has destroyed the profits of many a plantation. More than soil or climate or industry, it is "gap-sense" that distinguishes farmers. Two neighbors live on adjoining places, but one prospers and the other fails. They have the same soil and seasons, and are alike energetic, but the one accumulates and the other becomes a bankrupt. The one had "gap-sense" and the other had it not.

This makes the successful man of business. A merchant may have taste and genius in selecting a stock of goods, and the blandest affability of an accomplished salesman, but if he fails to watch the ledger and balance-sheet and expense account his fortune is soon gone. There are bankrupts to-day made so by leaving their entire business to employees who failed to put up the gaps.

This also finds illustration in professional and literary life. The results of our toilsome years of study too often become profitless. Many grand thoughts and facts might be safely herded, but, for lack of a little "gap-sense," they are scattered abroad never to return. It is not uncommon to find great students who accomplish very little. They are book-worms, and nothing more. The vast tomes they have read have never profited a farthing. "Gap-sense" is needed to record and utilize the labors of our brains.

And here we also find a wholesome religious lesson. It is an important element in religious character. Professed Christians have made shipwreck of the faith for lack of this virtue. When the resolution is formed, and the open confession made, and the baptismal vow ratified, and the solemn obligation assumed, and he is within the church, the young Christian must put up and guard the gaps behind him. He is never more to go out and return to the world. But if he neglects it, or thinks it unnecessary, soon every holy aspiration is gone, and he finds himself again wandering far from God. Many have fallen, even from the pulpit, to become apostates and cast-aways, because of failure to cultivate this shining virtue. So in all of life's relations and environments, "gap-sense" is a faculty of conspicuous importance.

Letter from Kansas City, Mo.

BY JOHN MATHEWS, D. D.

Nature is punctual. She freezes exactly at thirty-two degrees, and boils at 212. Men are not as punctual as nature. The heaviest snow-storm of the season prompts this epistle, and not punctuality to a promise given some weeks ago. Outside it is stormy and cold; inside there is quiet and glow. A snow-storm is sensational. Every one here grows excited over it. One's mind can but make comparisons, and one wonders which is most attractive, the South, with her flowers and floods, her cane-fields and cotton-plantations, her sunshine and beauties, or the West, with its weird snow-storms, its great hills, its quarries, its wheat fields and orchards, its industry and snap. It is said comparisons are odious. Let this letter prove a bridge connecting the sunny South with the great West.

Our city of nineteen years is growing rapidly. The energy displayed reminds one of the strides of a young and vigorous giant. Things move with revolutionary momentum. One sees, hears and reads things which astound. With all the published slurs over the crimes of the South she compares favorably with the West in this particular.

By-the-by, one of our leading journals contained an article the other day on a white baby for sale by a negro woman! Who would have dreamed of such a reversal of the old order. The gist of the story runs thus: Some white men left a white baby with this colored woman, promising to pay for the care of it. They failed to put in an appearance, and the woman's plan for proposing to auction off the child to the highest bidder was her inability to support it. Ours is a great country.

Kansas City has two regularly-equipped medical colleges. These are manned by men of high repute among the people. The commencement exercises of one were held last week in a Baptist Church. Our Rev. C. C. Woods, D. D., of Lydia Avenue Church, delivered an address, not only appropriate and elegant, but wisely conceived and worthy the occasion. The other commencement exercises were held in Walnut Street Church, South, this week. While we have two such worthy institutions, ours is not a sickly region. Missouri is an empire in itself, the fifth State in population, and needs physicians, if for no other purpose, to go over the land and inform people how to keep well.

We have operas, theaters, concert halls, as well as all the foreign forms of organized pleasures bearing on man's lower nature. Another opera house is going up, under a provision in the will of a lady who lived and died in Kansas City, the income to go to the support of orphans. Instead of erecting an asylum, her desire was to erect an opera house.

There is an organization here of great value to all classes. It is called the "Provident Society." A capable man is paid a fine salary for his services, and his whole time is given to the oversight of this work. All street beggars, all tramps, all strangers out of funds and friends, all worthy poor, all widows and orphans in want are sent to the rooms of this society. The gentleman in charge (aided by his assistants) looks into each case, and, if worthy, the parties are aided systematically until able to provide for themselves. What a mercy to ministers and people! The result of this organization is beggars are almost as rare at our doors as angels. However, one tramp learned that a certain minister was a stranger, and approached him with all the sweet blandishments of his profession until the pastor of Walnut Street Church was captured. It is saying a good deal, but he had more cheek than that pastor, and carried off two dollars.

In our church there is a well-organized Woman's Missionary Society. At their monthly meetings essays are read on missions, as well as selections from different missionary periodicals. For February the collections footed up eighty dollars. The New Orleans plan of collecting ten cents per month from each one willing to subscribe has been introduced, and works well. One of Miss Hallaran's friends suggested a small donation, to aid in her school building in Mexico, and the sum of twenty-five dollars was appropriated. She is not forgotten in this interior region.

This is a point where one can meet distinguished visitors. Last Sunday we had with us, at the evening service, an Irish Wesleyan minister—Mr. Ker. He is a large specimen of a man, full of health and humor. His discourse was on "Irish Methodist missions." He is well recommended. Indeed, he was pastor for years of the father of a gentleman in our city who is head of perhaps the most complete pork packing establishment in the world. Bishop McTyeir assured him of a welcome into his territory. Last Sunday night was his first appearance in a Methodist Episcopal Church, South. We gave him a welcome that made his Irish heart glad. It was in the form of a collection of five hundred and one dollars; the largest given him in America. His statement of the Irish question gave new light on that subject.

Dr. Vincent, of Sunday-school fame, has been in our city, lecturing and addressing the people. The Methodist Episcopal Church, North, held a Sunday-school congress. He was the chief figure. His lectures and addresses were both instructive and entertaining. He possesses that peculiar quality called common sense. He understands men, particularly the class giving our pastors and churches so much trouble; good enough men, but the grain runs both ways. It is a great advantage for a recognized leader to move among the churches. In some churches we have detectives. If the minister introduces a new method, they pounce him. Let one of these famous men appear and approve the method, these detectives at once release the pastor. Sometimes, however, the man of God has lost heart and hope before his release. Years ago, before Sunday-school missionary societies had an existence in our church, one of our ministers, who had charge of an influential church, introduced tin boxes into his school, each class to take one, and collect funds. Perhaps the most influential man in that church intensely opposed the plan, and would not allow a boy in his class to touch a box. The minister was considered an innovator, and the antagonism was injurious, until a Bishop appeared and endorsed the plan; then all was right with this man of power in the church. This pastor has been for Bishops ever since. They are not mere figure heads. They settle many cases to the joy of many brethren. No one has even invited your correspondent's opinion, but some opinions, even when volunteered, have merit in them. Let the General Conference give the church ten new Bishops! Yes, ten! Nothing else will satisfy the general and morbid clamor for the presence of our chief pastors. Go to almost any church gathering, from a General Conference to a "social," even when two or three prospective Bishops are present, and one hears the clamor on all sides. Fewer than fifteen can not even skim over the work.

Every Annual Conference needs a Bishop at its sessions; then every District Conference demands one, and if he is not on hand some of the preachers and people go to pouting, and write scathing letters to some Advocate about being neglected. Our college commencements must have a Bishop for a sermon or an address or a collection. Such officials draw, and, sick or well, must go. Infant baptism being on the increase in our church, a Bishop is clamored for at half the christenings, as well as the marriages. Camp meetings are multiplying, and each one clamors for a Bishop. Then the church dedications want one to draw for a large collection to pay off the debts. Besides, our protracted meetings are coming to demand the presence of these officials. Then they are required to answer everybody's letters as to whether Cousin Joe was heard of in Colorado, and if the Discipline allows dealing in "futures;" or if a man with ten children is desired in the —— Conference, who has some experience as a pastor. To say nothing of the living, Marvin did his best to go everywhere, and went into the grave. Doggett and Wightman tried to meet the demand, and overtaxed their vital forces; these find beyond what they did not get here—rest. Give us ten new Bishops, and this wild clamor will be partially stilled.

What meager salaries these leaders get! How some of them live on what they get is a mystery. One man responds: a Bishop gets five times as much as a certain minister. Yes, but he is required to live in places where social demands are very great. A Bishop is expected to contribute to everything and every one. More than this; one man is worth vastly more than another. One clerk works harder for fifty dollars than another who gets five hundred per month. It is simply one's misfortune that he gets so little. A judge of a Supreme Court resigned because the salary would not support him, yet it was six thousand dollars. The lawyer who lived on four hundred would have been delighted to have gone upon the bench, but * * *! Such small salaries, and require them to pay their own traveling expenses too? Shame upon a great church. Let the General Conference remove this blot upon the name of our church. Yes, there are men who would do the work of Bishops for half price, but they are the sort nobody wants.

MARCH 8, 1882.

Letter from Miss Linfield.

The following letter from Miss Annie E. Linfield was written two days before her father's death, though received two days after that event. Although a private letter we take the liberty of publishing it as it gives account of the last days of our lamented brother.

REV. DR. PARKER.—Dear Sir:—I received your letter a few days ago and have collected the order it contained. We are grateful indeed to the kind unknown friend, who still holds our dear father in such tender remembrance. To him we would return thanks and our appreciation of his kindness to our afflicted one, who is not able to express himself as he once could so appropriately. Our precious one is growing so weak and helpless every hour, it fills us with sadness. He has now given up his favorite chair for the bed, upon which we have to place him, turning him when we think he is weary, for he is utterly helpless, not able to stand at all. He is so emaciated and pale one could not help remarking it. One thing that makes us so sad is, that now he is compelled to lie in bed, when before, he seemed to think he was not so helpless, if he could sit in his chair. He has not been able for four months to sit at the table with us. We have a little table for him, and bring his meals in to him; now he has no appetite whatever, and has to be fed from a spoon. No one can imagine what a sufferer he has been, and we all see and feel that we will not have the poor blind, afflicted, one to nurse much longer.

While it is most sorrowful to us to give him up, yet we feel that it would be unkind to him and sinful to wish him to remain with us, knowing full well there is no relief for his sufferings. We try to leave it all in the hands of a wise one who doeth all for the best. God help us. We are all gratified for your words of sympathy, it does us good to know that the old friends and companions of our honored father still remember him tenderly and sympathize with him. He is not able to recall any one of his family even, though we think he knows our voices from strangers.

Ma is bearing up bravely yet you could see that trouble is telling on her. We all keep well for which we are very thankful. Remember us in prayer, our father is in a critical condition.

Sincerely your friend,

ANNIE E. LINFIELD.

Baltimore Conference.

This body met at Fredericksburg, Va., March 8-13. Bishop McTyeire presiding. The appointments will be found on our eighth page. We call the following items from the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist:

Rev. Samuel Rodgers, D. D., on behalf of the members of Conference, presented Rev. Dr. J. S. Martin with a handsome gold watch and chain. He feelingly alluded to his intimacy with Dr. Martin for many years, and spoke in high terms of his efficiency as secretary of the Conference for the last twenty years.

The report on Sunday-schools showed 479 schools, 28,014 scholars, 40,592 volumes in the libraries, 970 conversions in the schools, and $19,740 expenses.

The statistics of the Conference showed a membership of 30,947 white and 61 colored; local preachers, 110; total salaries paid ministers, $79,000; admission on profession of faith, 3,659; church edifices, 382; and parsonages, 79.

Charleston, W. Va., was selected as the place for the next Conference to meet.

Revs. Dr. Crook and Oliver McCutcheon, of the Irish Methodist Church, were introduced with feeling remarks by the Bishop, who referred to the troubles of the land league that Ireland was now bearing.

Rev. Dr. J. B. Ferrin offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we hail with pleasure the visit of our distinguished brethren of the Methodist Church of Ireland the Rev. Dr. Crook and the Rev. Oliver McCutcheon.

Resolved, That we sympathize with our brethren of the Methodist Church in Ireland, and that in their financial necessities they justly merit not only our sympathy but material aid.

Resolved, That we commend our brethren to the love and confidence of our brethren everywhere, and hope that out of our means they may receive help in the time of their extremity, and that we will give them aid in their commendable mission.

DELEGATES TO GENERAL CONFERENCE.—Clerical: A. W. Wilson, R. Smithson, Samuel Rodgers, John S. Martin, Jas. S. Gardner, Wm. P. Harrison. Alternates: J. C. Dice, W. H. D. Harper, P. H. Whisner, T. E. Carson. Lay: J. B. Wilson, E. B. Prettyman, T. J. Magruder, J. P. Houck, J. H. H. Figgatt, J. B. Cox. Alternates: W. W. Ballard, J. B. Bond, P. Hammill, and R. McCoy.

Note from Bishop Paine.

Our beloved and venerable senior Bishop writes us as follows to the editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate:

MY DEAR BRO. FITZGERALD: I obey you and inclose "more copy" of "Notes of Life." Have been in bed and quite ill over two weeks. I really supposed I had finished my course and was about to enter into eternal rest, but am able once more to sit up and scrawl a few lines. The decease of my honored and beloved colleague affected me deeply. Surely "God moves in a mysterious way," but all his ways are in wisdom and mercy.

My friends express a hope I may be at the General Conference. I can not say I expect it. Am too feeble to be of any use if I go—yet it would be a great pleasure to do so. God's will be done. I am happy and ready. I sometimes fear, "in age and feebleness extreme," I am impatient to be gone. If I can do any good to immortal souls by staying and suffering, or be made more holy, then I am willing to stay. My father knows, and I submit to him.

Love to the brethren and old friends.

H. PAINE.

AGERDEEN, Miss., March 6, 1882.

Rev. James A. Godfrey, presiding elder of Meridian district, Mississippi Conference, writing from Meridian, March 15, 1882, says: "I am pleased with the general outlook on Meridian district. Pastors all well and hopeful and I think will have a prosperous year. We will all work for the ADVOCATE."

Our Sunday-School Work.

Our Nashville Sunday-school periodicals for April are out in good style. The Quarterly, the Monthly Magazine, the Visitor, and the Little People, make up a fine budget for the Sunday-school teachers and scholars: On "our Sunday-school department," Dr. Cunningham says:

In addition to what we said last month concerning a more perfect organization of our Sunday-school department, we would remark:

1. We believe that the Sunday-school has reached a degree of development as an educational agency when a graded curriculum is a necessity. Such a curriculum should embrace all the subjects of study usually pursued in a primary, biblical, and theological course. The Bible forms the basis of all our religious teaching, and in any system of instruction which may be adopted the text of God's word must be the principal subject of study, both in matter and form. In order to this, a selection from the Scriptures in the form of a lesson—as in the present International scheme—must be made. For all practical purposes, we may continue to use the selections of the International Committee, as heretofore; but the method of using these selections must be conformed to the requirements of the graded system, and so extended as to include regular instruction in the doctrines and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. How this is to be done—whether by the addition of supplemental lessons or in some other way—remains to be considered hereafter. At present we wish to suggest only the general idea of a graded curriculum.

2. In connection with such a system, there ought to be text-books for normal classes, furnishing such helps as may be necessary in order to enable an average teacher to study the subjects of the course thoroughly. These could be provided without much trouble or expense. Many of the books are already in our general catalogue, and could be provided in a cheap and convenient form.

These two points we deem of the first importance in our Sunday-school work—a graded curriculum, and proper helps for normal classes. Our space will not allow a further discussion of the subject at present. The object of these lines is simply to suggest a few points for consideration. We trust the whole matter will be thoroughly considered in detail by our next General Conference.

—Our news columns on eighth page will give account of the great flood. During the past week the condition has grown worse. New Orleans is still out of the water and will probably continue so. The overflow in Louisiana has increased, and there is wide spread destitution and suffering.

It is estimated that in the entire Mississippi valley at this time 14,200 square miles are flooded, an area equal to the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island.

Our State authorities are doing what they can. Congress has appropriated large sums, and much is being contributed by private individuals. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange has organized a relief committee, and money is being subscribed. The most prompt and liberal measures should be taken by our own people.

The demand is most urgent. People are dying of starvation and suffering for clothing, shelter and the barest necessaries.

The water is declining a little at Memphis, Helena and some other points in the upper sections of the overflow. At New Orleans it has been steadily rising but has probably reached its culmination. We hope within the coming week to note a general decline, but it will take weeks for this world of waters to run off. God help our sorely stricken country.

—We learn that our brethren of Shreveport, La., have purchased lots at the head of Texas street as the sight for a new church building. May the good work go on auspiciously and promptly in spite of floods. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Shreveport, needs a new house, and we are gratified to know that it will probably be built soon.

—We notice that Rev. C. B. Galloway of the Mississippi Conference has been appointed by Gov. Lowry, and confirmed by the Senate, a trustee of the University of Mississippi. Bro. Galloway is a graduate of the University, and will perform his duties as trustee with faithfulness and ability.

—A gentleman of Baton Rouge, La., through the pastor, Rev. J. T. Daves, sends this week ten dollars for Dr. Linfield. This is the second remittance, through Bro. Daves, for this worthy object.

—Rev. R. W. Evans, of the Little Rock Conference, died in Eastland county, Texas, February 20.

—We are very glad to learn that Dr. C. W. Miller, of Kentucky, for sometime seriously ill, is now rapidly convalescing.

FOR MEXICO.—I sent off to-day, July 20, to Dr. W. M. Patterson, City of Mexico, $220—$120 for our teacher, Mrs. Cuevas, and $100 more for our church at Ameca. This makes $100 sent to build that church, and $240 for our teacher since the 31 day of January, 1881. Besides this I have sent to our two schools in China $175. Add it up, and see what you have done in less than six months. I shall in a few days send $40 for the education of Rosebud Campbell in China. Truly may we ask what hath God wrought by the hands of the little ones! To his name be everlasting praise. UNCLE LARRY.

—Richmond Advocate.

The negro is a wonderful being. "Unbeknowing and unbearing" to himself, he divided a great church in 1844, and "unbeknowing and unbearing" to himself, he now threatens either to be the means of somewhat uniting these two divisions, or of dividing one of the divisions again. Let us do the best we can for him, but let us be sure that he no more divides us.—As a rule his warm friends try to do too much for him and those who are not specially his friends want to do too little. The conservative men are the ones to listen to on this subject. May they predominate.

Rev. Dr. C. H. Fowler, Methodist, said in a recent speech: "I am persuaded that more men will go from the Methodist Church to hell for the sin of covetousness than for all other sins put together." We fear that they will have not a few Baptist neighbors in that long land of deep despair.—Christian Index.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are repeating in Scotland their campaign of seven or eight years ago. At Glasgow and Pollokshields they have had large crowds in attendance and plenty of work in the inquiry room.

Bishop Levi Scott is in a very feeble condition at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. Geo. L. Townsend, near Odessa, Delaware.

Rev. J. M. Pugh, writing from Yazoo river, Miss., March 13, says: The overflow has reached us; the country is flooded and very few dwellings are now entirely above water. My yard and garden are submerged, and the water is still rising. Valley High-School has suspended; for awhile the pupils attended in skiffs. The Pope said he was a prisoner in the Vatican. I feel somewhat a prisoner, being surrounded by water. Of course all business is suspended, and the people are concerned mainly about meeting the present emergency. The church owes for the building at Yodi $130, and the gentleman to whom it is due very much needs the money. Will not your readers aid a weak church to save their property? The church might be closed against us. I solicit aid from the friends of the church.

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The fourth Annual Meeting of the General Executive Association, Woman's Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will convene in Nashville, Tenn., Thursday, May 18, 1882. All delegates are requested to communicate immediately with the corresponding secretary of the Tennessee Conference Society, stating if it is their intention to attend the meeting. Delegates will be provided with pleasant homes.

It will be a season of special interest to Southern Methodism as the General Conference will be in session at same time and place. All who attend will be cordially welcomed.

Address MRS. S. E. SPENCE,
Cor. Sec. Tenn. Conf. Society.
SPRINGFIELD, Tennessee.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Mississippi Conference Woman's Missionary Society will meet in Crystal Springs at the Methodist Church, April 6, 1882, at ten o'clock A. M. Each auxiliary is requested to elect a delegate and make report to the Conference Society. This meeting is very important, as it immediately precedes the meeting of the General Society in May, and the General Conference of the church. The Crystal Springs Auxiliary has kindly invited us to meet with them. Any of our pastors who can attend will be welcomed to our meeting, and can render us valuable aid. I would thank Rev. W. B. Lewis to assist the ladies in arranging for the annual meeting.

MRS. W. B. NUGENT, President.

TO OUR AGENTS.—The publisher would be greatly obliged if all agents would remit promptly collections for subscriptions, or, at least once a month, send amount on hand with names from whom collected. It is hoped that extra efforts will be made this year to secure a large number of new subscribers, and as the General Conference will meet in May the paper will be unusually interesting and of great value to every member of the church.

Books and Periodicals.

GEMS FROM NORTHFIELD. Edited by T. J. Shanks. Chicago: F. H. Revell.

The work purports to be a record of some of the best thoughts exchanged at the thirty days Conference for Bible study convened by Mr. Moody at Northfield, Mass., August, 1881. Much of the volume is taken up with the discourses of Dr. Bonar. He and Mr. Moody were the chief speakers. His views on the second coming of Christ accord with those of Mr. Moody, and the views of both of them are we think unwholesome and unscriptural. There is, however, in these pages a great deal that is valuable to Christian workers, and that is helpful and stimulating to the Christian life and experience. It is measurably free from cant, and from that which is dull and common-place.

LESSONS FROM THE LIFE OF SAINT PETER. Six Essays. By A. A. Lipscomb, D. D., L. L. D., Emeritus Professor, Vanderbilt University. John W. Burke & Co., publishers, Macon, Ga.

The six essays make an octavo of 120 pages. Price in paper cover fifty cents, bound sixty cents. We need not commend the work of this great master in theology and literature. Every thing that Dr. Lipscomb writes is worth reading, and these lectures are among his best things. His portrait of the Apostle Peter is characterized by the author's well-known excellencies of style, by his rare spiritual discernment, and by his peculiar powers of analysis. It is a work of great merit—a production which devout and thoughtful Christians will prize.

TO-DAYS AND YESTERDAYS. By Carrie Adelaide Cooke. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. Price $1.25.

A story running through over three hundred 8x6 pages. A religious story designed for the edification of girls whose school-days are ended and who are considering what next is to be done. Say the publishers: The story opens at a New Hampshire seminary on the eve of examination day, and the principal characters are three girls, school-companions and fellow-graduates. It is not a story of incident, nor does its interest depend upon strong contrasts or vivid descriptions. The narrative is a quiet following out of the currents of these three lives, with their various changes, their joys and sorrows.

WHAT ABOUT FRED? By Parthenia B. Chambers. New York: Thomas G. Crowell & Co.

A beautiful volume as to paper, binding, typography, and illustrations. It is a story about Fred. It seems to be a religious story, but we have not found time to read it with care. From the table of contents we give some of the titles of the chapters: Auld Lang Syne; A Plain Case; A Pleasant Day; The Motleys at Home; Trouble in the School; A Good Teacher; Family Troubles; Do You Know About Jesus; Settling Down; Lord Decide the Doubtful Case; Home Again; False Notes.

—The Southern Pulpit for March lays before its readers a rich repast. Rev. Wm. Pratt, D. D., L. L. D., of California, contributes "An Imaginary Symposium Between Colonel Ingersoll and a Lawyer." Prof. Maughon, of the University of North Carolina, and Dr. Granberry, of the Vanderbilt University, each furnish a sermon. "The Demand of Unbelief" is clearly treated by Rev. Mr. Williams, of Virginia. Dr. Mullally, of Lexington, Va., expounds on the "Twelfth Chapter of Romans;" while Dr. DuBose, of Texas, and Rev. Mr. Lewis, of Louisiana, give strong Outlines of Sermons. The Preacher's Note-Book, Suggestions on Texts, Homiletical Illustrations, etc., complete this valuable number. Specimen free. Subscription, $1.50, Jackson & Lafferty, Richmond, Va.

—The series of articles on the Christian religion, by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black and Prof. George P. Fisher, which appeared recently in the North American Review, is now published in pamphlet form. The price of the volume is fifty cents, and it is for sale at all news-stands and book-stores.

—The Art Amateur, March, 1882, is as usual splendidly illustrated, and the supplement of designs is excellent. The literature of art in this magazine is of even more value than the illustrations. It is a publication that has in it much of practical import—embracing the useful as well as the beautiful. Montague Marks, editor and publisher. Price $1 a year.

A charming old pedant in the country, on learning that a favorite pupil of his had been taken upon the staff of a Boston paper, wrote to the editor-in-chief concerning the young man: "If he should have a career I shall be very happy in thinking that the spark which I have watered contained in it the germ of a structure destined to soar and elevate with its radiance your privileged readers." He also advised the editor to "give the young man a hint that may quench the seeds of ambition ere yet they swell to a gale that will take the bits between its teeth and dazzle by its clamor."—Boston Courier.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proved in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. When an Austin schoolmaster entered his temple of learning a few mornings ago he read on the blackboard the touching legend: "Our teacher is a donkey." The pupils expected there would be a combined cyclone and earthquake, but philosophic pedagogue contented himself with adding the word "driver" to the legend and opened the school as usual.

Send the ADVOCATE to your friend for the next year and you will not regret it.

"A young naturalist" writes us to learn how he "can catch a live wasp for scientific purposes without injuring it." Light by the tail, you: right at the tip end of the tail. Squeeze hard. The wasp won't mind it a particle, and if it seems to be injured any that you can see, send us the bill and we'll pay for a new wasp.

Professor (to student who writes, not for the masses, but for the educated few)—"You should write so that the most ignorant of your audience can understand all you say." Student (puzzled)—"What part of my production is not clear to you sir?"

Where's the molasses, Bill?" said a red-headed woman sharply to her son who had returned with an empty jug. "None in the city, mother. Every grocery has a large board outside with the letters chalked on it, 'N. O. Molasses.'"

Beneficent nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Lanlace's Indian Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

"Are you going to make a flower-bed here?" asked a young lady of her father's gardener. "Yes miss; them's the orders." "Why it'll spoil our croquet ground!" "Can't help it, miss. Your papa says he's bound to have this plot laid out for horticulture, not husbandry."

Sandy Fairley (who has just put half a crown into the church-plate, instead of a penny, and who is not allowed to take it back): "Weel, weel, I'll get credit for twa an' six in Heaven!" The elder: "Na, na; ye'll only get credit for a penny."

Mr. Phillip Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, can sell you a good Hale piano for $225, $75 cash and $10 monthly for fifteen months, no interest, including stool and cover. This is certainly very fair and shows the confidence that Mr. Werlein has in his pianos. THE HUSBANDMAN.

Give fools their gold and knaves their pow,
Let fortune's bubbles rise and fall;
Who sows a field or trains a flower
Or plants a tree is more than all.

For he who blesses most is blest
And God and man shall own his worth,
Who toils to leave as his bequest
An added beauty to the earth.

And soon or late, to all that sow
The time of harvest shall be given
The flower shall bloom, the fruit shall grow
If not on earth, at least in heaven.

OUR COMMON BIRDS.—We give below the conclusion of Mr. Green's report to the Western New York Horticultural Society.

I used to cut back my apple trees to short stubs at planting. I have since learned better. These would die back an inch or more, leaving sharp spurs. In going over these trees with the pruning knife subsequently, I found numerous frogs impaled on the spurs. The frogs were driven over the spurs firmly, and one might have excuses for suspecting evidence helpful to the theory of frogs raining down. There is little room for doubt that the butcher bird hung these unfortunate frogs. This brownish bird is found in the Middle and Northern States, breeding at the North. The nest is of grass and leaves, built in low bushes or trees. Eggs yellowish brown, spotted and streaked, five or six in number. It abides mainly in unfrequented places, and has a habit of continually jerking the tail. Its flight is undulating and rapid, darting like a hawk, when pursuing its prey. It is not easily approached. Its food is mainly insects and mice, but is not averse to any kind of flesh. Being somewhat greedy, he catches more game than he can devour there are no men like him, and thrusts it on sharp spurs as a butcher would a quarter of beef, but unlike the butcher, he often forgets his store, or prefers that which is fresh, for his victims are often found as he left them, in no part devoured.

The red-headed woodpecker is classed among migrating birds, but I have often seen him in protected positions during winter in this vicinity. On the 26 of last December I heard a familiar drumming in the orchard, and on searching, found master Red-cap pecking away as though for dear life, at the juncture of a decayed limb. I drew quite close: he was not alarmed, but kept his eyes on me, at the same time drilling away like a steam pile-driver. He has followed the specialty of dislodging insects so long he can learn their whereabouts and direct his beak, though blinded—a rebuke to men who are jacks of all trades but master of none. He is an active, solitary bird, reminding one of those energetic people who are too busy to visit, or gossip about their neighbors. He sometimes has a companion, but seldom lets her interrupt business. Aside from insects, he rivals the boys in searching for and storing nuts; acorns, chestnuts and beechnuts are his delight, and woe to the intruding robber, be he squirrel or brother, who dares to test the wares in his storehouse—the stumps and hollows of trees. By way of dessert, he is not adverse to a ripe harvest apple or a peach, and when cherries ripen, he drops other diet in proportion to the quantity and quality of cherries to be had for the picking. Master Red-head is not so commonly seen as of old, which I regret, for all our woodpeckers are good friends.

We have a bird known as the "highhold," which does great damage to peaches, drilling into them with his pondurous beak, and ruining them often when only one side is soft. He is a greedy fellow, and not welcome. Though birds are plentiful, our grapes at Clifton, N. Y., are not molested, or other small fruits to any serious extent—strawberries perhaps the most often, next to cherries. I have seen myriads of common yellow birds hovering over the strawberry beds, and with much trepidation at first, but I could not see that they did much damage; they were apparently after other food than berries.

The oriole is not often seen at my place. He is considered the most destructive in the vineyard, but is one of the best insect destroyers. I think a windmill attached to a bell, or bells run by clocks, or some such contrivance, would drive them away. In the cities, vines are often protected by mosquito netting, for birds are much more numerous there in comparison to the food supply, and must ever be more troublesome than in the open country.

The swallow is one of the best of our feathered friends, living the abode of mankind, being numerous, remaining with us constantly for a large part of the year, and doing no injury, confining themselves wholly to insects, of which each swallow will destroy a thousand in a day while skimming the air. The chimney swallow is distinct in his habits from the common barn swallow, coming out to catch insects more often as dusk approaches, and continuing his work far into the night, as I have had good opportunity to observe. A pair have nested over our fireplace in the chimney, for many years, taking possession before we had time, after late spring fires, to close their entrance, after building their nests we had not the heart to disturb them. Only one season did we cover the chimney early enough to prevent their nesting therein. I could hear the parent bird flutter out and in at all hours of the night, when I happened to be awake, the little ones screeching lustily for the insects brought down to them. The early part of the night the birds were particularly busy gathering insects.

Evidence accumulates against the sparrow as an agent of destruction of insects, but in favor of his preference for buds, fruits and grain. In Australia he has become a notorious pest, and rewards are recommended for his head and eggs.

The robin I regret to state, is not so helpful as his more modest brethren. His diet is largely fruit, and the insects he destroys are more often beneficial than noxious.

TREES AND RUNNING STREAMS.—The following article, which we take from an exchange, contains advice and warning that should be of value to farmers: Some twenty-five years ago all the farmers of Ohio were seized with a rage of frenzy against timber growing along the margins of small streams running through their lands. These strips of timber were regarded as eye-sores and evidence of untidy farming. And, strange to say, scientific agricultural journals advised this war of extermination upon willow, birch, elm, cottonwood and other trees and shrubs. It was urged that acres upon acres of excellent grass land could be reclaimed and made productive by "clearing up" the meadow lands. In the hilly portions of the State the timber was removed from the wooded slope of ravines. The result of this unthinking craze are now apparent. Not a drop of water is visible in brooks, and even in large runs and creeks wherever the timber has been removed, while the "slovenly" farmer who was too lazy to peel, chop and burn his willows has had an abundance of water for his stock all through the dry season. That is a lesson which tidy farmers should thoroughly study. If streams fed by springs are protected by shades they will continue to flow until the springs fail, but if exposed to the rays of the sun the water must inevitably be evaporated in dry, hot weather. That is the secret of having water for stock. Farmers who have cleared away the timber from ravines and the margins of streams should lose no time in retrieving their error. Trees should be planted. Willow is of quick growth and makes an excellent shade, but is not valuable as a timber tree. Butternut, walnut and two or three varieties of hickory—all valuable for their timber—will grow to perfection in the moist soil along the margins of streams, large or small. The roots of these trees strike deep into the ground; hence such trees do but little injury to grass or crops—the shade alone being injurious. The same is true of the willow, whereas the roots of beech, elm and sugar maple, having the roots near the surface, absorb the moisture and nutriment necessary to the growth of grass or any crop. We therefore advise farmers to plant butternut, walnut, hickory and the like, along the banks of streams running through their premises. Neither butternut nor hickory will bear trans-planting, and the only practicable plan is to plant the nuts, and they should be planted in the fall soon after having fallen from the trees. Plenty of nuts should be planted—five or ten times as many as trees desired—since very little work will be required to remove the surplus trees should too many of them grow. Walnuts also should be planted in the fall. Interspersed with these trees it would be well to plant crab apple and wild plum tree. The slope of ravines may be planted to any timber trees indigenous to the country, or the ailanthus or tulpa—both valuable for their timber. The ailanthus and several varieties of hickory will grow on the most barren slopes if they once start."

THE FRUIT GARDEN.—There should be a Fruit Garden on every farm for the profit, health, and enjoyment that it brings, where well cared for—yielding a succession of fruits from early strawberry time until the latest grapes are gone. It is our desire that all who have no garden for small fruits may resolve to prepare the ground and plant one the coming spring. The soil for a Fruit Garden should be rich, deep, and mellow, and above all thoroughly drained should it be naturally wet. There is nothing better than well rotted stable manure for enriching a garden soil. The list of strawberries that may be planted is a long one and has been added to from year to year. Charles Downing, Seth Boyden, Monarch of the West, and Sharpless are all reliable. The Bidwell has proved excellent, and the Manchester is a promising new sort. On heavy soils the Jucunda and Triomphe de Gand do well. Among raspberries are the Cuthbert, Patrican, and Herstine. The Mammouth Cluster and Gregg are among the best Black-caps for general use. For blackberries the Kittatinny and Snyder are the best. The Versailles, Red Dutch, and White Grape lead in the Currants. It is difficult to select from the long list of excellent grapes; Concord, Wilder, Brighton, Eumelan, Delaware, and Niagara give a good variety.—American Agriculturist.

COAL ASHES.—Coal ashes are not as valuable for fertilizers as they are for other purposes. We know of no better absorbents than coal ashes, and we are always surprised to see large, unsightly pile of such ashes laying around dwellings when they might be profitably used in the privy vaults and for absorbing the sewage from the house. There is very little, if any, free alkali in them, so that they never liberate ammonia, but rather absorb it, also absorbing other offensive smell. Coal ashes could also be used to advantage in the hog pen, but much of their value depends upon the temperature at which they are burned. Ashes from furnaces are frequently vitrified—that is, they are burned at such a high temperature that they are dissolved to a certain extent. When this is the case they make excellent garden walks. Their mechanical effects upon the soil are excellent; they render stiff, clayey soils more porous, and, strange as it may appear, they render sandy soils more compact. We have frequently spread them upon grass lands and have been satisfied of their beneficial effects there, but have not yet determined whether the benefits arose from their mechanical effects in breaking the continuity of the sod or from the small amount of alkali they contained.

ECONOMY OF OXEN.—A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker suggests that it will be well to utilize Jersey bulls as working oxen, rather than to dip them in the bud for veal, and he cites this illustrative instance: "A neighbor has a pair of four-year-old full-bred Jersey steers at work now on his farm, which are as strong and useful as a pair of good fifteen-hand horses. Their natural walk is at least four miles per hour and they are fair brothers, reminding me in all their movements and work of the admirable Connecticut working oxen. They are also very handy and do not mind the hot sun at all. Considering the small cost of their harness—a simple yoke and a pair of bows—and the quickness and ease with which they can be attached to and detached from the cart, plough or harrow, these cattle are more economical than either of the three pairs of work horses that are kept on the same farm with them."

EARLY TOMATOES.—George Henning, Saratoga, N. Y., plants his tomato seeds in January and February, and when the plants are five or six inches high cuts of the tops just above seed leaves and sets them out as cuttings in a properly prepared hot bed where they take root and grow. In April they are transplanted to cold frames and finally set out in the open ground. Mr. Henning claims that by this treatment the plants have better roots than when allowed to retain their original ones, and that they bear earlier and more productive.—Fruit Recorder.

FARM EXPERIMENTS.—The successful farmer, like the successful teacher, is an experimentalist. He does not run his experiments all over the farm, but while the main business proceeds according to approved methods, he always has his experiments in progress where they do not interfere with his general work.

Household.

TEA COSIES.—Ever since returning from visiting in England, I have often wondered why "tea cosies" were not used more generally here. They are not only very ornamental articles, but very useful ones as well, especially where one or more members of a family, who like their tea hot, as most of us do, necessarily are often detained later than the rest of the family, and when it is not always convient to send the teapot to be kept warm on the fire. Tea cosies, being lined with cotton batting, when placed over the teapot, effectually prevent any of the steam from escaping, and consequently the tea is kept hot for a great length of time.

Tea cosies are quite simple in construction. Those for general use I have seen usually made of some bright-colored cloth—scarlet and cardinal seeming to be the favorite colors. Generally the sides are embroidered or braided, with a fancy design on one, and a monogram on the other. In making them, it is best first to cut out of paper a pattern shaped like half an oval, rather pointed at the top, cutting two pieces alike from them together, and see that it is large enough to cover the teapot it is to be used over, with several inches to spare all around; then cut your cloth the size of your paper; after it is embroidered or braided, cover the inside surface with cotton batting, and stitch the two pieces together; then line with silesia of some light color, and finish with sowing around the outside edge a heavy silk cord. Some tea cosies are made either of silk, satin or plush, or of those materials combined, and look very handsome.—Annie M., in Country Gentleman.

COLD FEET.—Says the London Lancet: It is, as we have often labored to show, a mistake to suppose there is any warmth in clothes. Animal heat is the direct result of changes going on within the body itself. Nutrition by food and the discharges of energy by exercise are the efficient causes of heat. Clothes "seem" good and warm because they prevent the cold air and objects with a capacity for heat which surround the body from attracting the heat generated within its organism. The clothing is simply an insulator. It follows that it should be light in weight, and above all things, that it should permit the free and full circulation of blood through every part of the system—to the end of every finger and toe—and that the muscular apparatus of the extremities should be in perfect working order. If we will wear foot coverings, whether boots or stockings, which compress the feet and render the separate action of each toe impossible, it is simply absurd to expect to be warm-footed. Heat is the compliment of work and nutrition, and if a part of the organism is so bound that it can not work, and its supply of food is limited, it must be cold. The resort to stouter and heavier clothing is simply ridiculous. Generally it is the stockings that compress the feet. The garter acts as a ligature, and diminishes the blood supply, while the stocking itself acts as a bandage; and impedes the circulation through the extremeties.

SOME HINTS FOR OUR YOUNG WOMEN.—We have before our eyes a young lady who is a type of a large class, and because of her representativeness, a sketch of her will not be thrown away. She is wasting her nervous force and her life in a lamentable manner. She expends enough force and energy in a day to last one so slim of stature for a week. Nothing she does is done slowly or deliberately. Always in the hottest, possibly hurry, her life seems to be wound up to the highest possible pitch. She dashes about the house, slams doors, and bolts her food in half the time that more sober people take to eat theirs. With her, trifles are momentous; her tongue seems to be incapable of uttering a soft sound; her temper is all afire at a moment's notice; her adjectives are all superlatives, and sometimes she is ready to weep because she has no bigger and more expressive superlatives to use. Her energy, if properly engineered, would almost stem Niagara; she never moves except as if she were a Maud S., and going for a wager. Fervidness and rapture are her daily food. Where will all this end? We answer—in the madhouse or the grave. It is the pace that kills; it is the pace which renders nervous prostration one of the most prolific diseases of the day. Let those of our women who are always intense take a thought for the next generation in whom the seeds of this abnormal haste are being sown with fatal effect.—Herald of Health.

TABLE LINEN.—Napkins of various tints, more properly called doilies, are used in serving fruits. For ordinary table use white table-cloths and white napkins are in vogue as they have been. There are cloths with narrow bands of scarlet or crimson along the edge, with napkins of the same description, that are very tasteful.

STAIR CARPETS.—Get some crimson baize and tear it sufficiently narrow to show the border of the carpet beneath at each edge. It strengthens the edges of the baize to stitch them along about an inch from the edge, without turning them under, with a sewing machine. This is very cheap and durable, and has a bright, cheerful effect.

CARBONATE OF AMMONIA.—A few drops of carbonate of ammonia in a small quantity of warm rain water will prove a safe and easy anti-acid, and will change, if carefully applied, discolored spots upon carpets, and indeed all spots, whether produced by acids or alkalies. If you have a carpet injured by whitewash this will immediately restore it.

BAKING POWDER.—In using baking powder be sure not to use too much. Besides being unhealthful it spoils the delicate flavor of cake and of biscuit. It is a great temptation to put in a little more than that given in a recipe to make sure of the desired lightness, but it ought to be resisted. If you are not your own cake maker, impress this fact upon your cook.

BEST PEACHES FOR CANNING.—Among the peaches the Morris White has long been highly prized for canning. This is a pure white peach, the main point in which it differs from other sorts being that it is white next to the pit. Most kinds of peaches have a reddish tint next to the stone, but yellow peaches are to be preferred, as they have a higher color and a richer flavor.

BEE STING.—A contemporary says a fresh tomato leaf is a sovereign cure for a bee sting. Another says: Ammonia relieves pain and prevents swelling from bee or wasp stinging.

Educational.

—Maryland paid out for public school education last year the sum of one million six hundred and four thousand five hundred and eighty dollars and seventy-seven cents. The State has two thousand and thirty-nine schools, and an average attendance of seventy-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty-nine. There are in the State one hundred and thirty-four thousand four hundred and eighty-eight persons who are unable to read or write. The amount expended on colored schools last year was one hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred and forty-four dollars and fifty-three cents. The secretary of the State Board of Education asks if help can be obtained from Congress for the illiterates. He declares that the proportion of illiterate in the several counties corresponds generally to the proportion of colored population.

—The inspectors of the British national schools are, as a rule, university men and graduates in honors. The defects of the existing system of inspection are said to be three-fold. There is no sufficient unity of action among the inspectors themselves; school-managers are too much at the mercy of individual inspectors, an appeal against whose decisions produces few beneficial results and is only resorted to in very extreme cases; no adequate opportunities for engaging in the work of inspection are offered to those who had had experience in public elementary schools. As a first step in reform, the department intends to appoint as assistant inspectors the best masters of public elementary schools.

—Mr. W. W. Corcoran, the distinguished philanthropist, has given the Columbian University of Washington, a valuable lot at the southwest corner of Vermont Avenue and I street, as the site of a new university building, which is to be erected there at an early day. The new building will be the home of the college law school and of the scientific school, which latter adjunct of the university will hereafter fill a conspicious place in its plans of instruction. The university has had it in purpose to erect a scientific school as a part of its curriculum since the year 1873.

—The Howard University, at Washington, D. C., has a large increase of students this fall, chiefly in the normal, preparatory, and medical departments. The late Francis P. Schoals, of this city, has left the institution $5,000, to be paid after the death of Mrs. Schoals. The theological department is now under the care and support of the American Missionary Association, with the exception of one lectureship sustained by the Presbytery of Washington.

—Roumania, with a population of 5,370,000, has only 118,015 children in school, or 2.2 pupils for 100 inhabitants. The number of pupils in secondary schools is about 8,000. The two universities of Bukarest and Jassy have 500 students. Training institutions for teachers are not mentioned at all. The total expenditure for education amounts to $1,250,000 a year, while the military establishment requires the large amount of $2,500,000 a year.

—Rev. Dr. Gladden thinks that pupils should learn such things as will tend to make them happy in whatever calling they may choose. He suggests that all possible way should be devised in school to awaken the minds of the pupils and stimulate a thirst for knowledge; and he suggests that boys should be made to see that farm life is far from lonely or uninteresting. They should be taught natural history and mineralogy.

—The Union Theological Seminary at New York is in luck. Ex-Gov. Morgan's gift of $200,000 has already been supplemented by gifts of $100,000 from D. Willis James, for a new dormitory; $50,000 from Morris K. Jessup, for library building; $80,000 from an anonymous friend for a chair of Biblical theology, and several contributions of $5,000, and $10,000.

—In St. Petersburg this year nine hundred and eighty women are pursuing the higher courses of education; six hundred and ten of these students are of noble origin. Physics and mathematics are studied by five hundred and twenty-one, and four hundred and seventeen take literature.

—The directors of Girard College intend, it is reported, to organize a school of mechanical handiwork, like that which is now in successful operation in Spring Garden Institute, in Philadelphia. This school has from ninety to one hundred pupils in its workrooms, and it has drawing classes with five hundred pupils.

—Prof. Frost, of Oberlin, in making an urgent plea for the teaching of patriotism in the public schools, says that the history of our own country is so essential, so necessary, so indispensable that every urchin who will ever cast a vote ought to be caught and taught perforce.

—The University of Pennsylvania promises to establish fifty-three scholarships for pupils of the Philadelphia public schools, at an annual value of at least $7,500, in consideration of the city's selling to them a small plot of ground adjoining their institution.

—To teach the Spanish language in the American high-schools is a plan proposed by the Memphis Appeal, which argues that at no distant day Mexico will become a part of the United States, and that way fortune lies for young men who can talk Spanish.

—The total value of school property in West Virginia is $1,743,929. The school population is 213,441, the attendance 91,298. There are 4,327 public school teachers in the state, 117 of whom are colored. The average salary given to teachers is $26,61.

—Columbia College has 275 students in the School of Arts, 257 in the School of Mines, 471 in the School of Law, 547 in the School of Medicine, and twenty-two in the School of Political Science. In all departments the college has 1,572 students.

—An American school for the study of Greek literature, archæology and art will be established at Athens next Nov. The necessary funds have been secured, and Dr. Goodwin, of Harvard, will take charge of the school.

—It is stated that ex-Gov. Morgan, of New York, has made a gift of $20,000 to Williams College for the purpose of building a dormitory.

—The Iowa Legislature has passed a bill providing that the State Board of Examiners shall hereafter always have a lady member.

—The late William Wheelright has left $138,000 to found in Newburyport, Mass., a school for instruction in practical business knowledge.

—Louisiana has a school population of 200,036. Of this number, 139,657 are colored.

BY H. WALTER FEATHERSTON.

THE ESTRELLA WEDDING.

One summer afternoon in 1880, as I was walking along one of the less frequented streets of San Luis Obispo—then my field of labor—I heard some one behind me calling. I turned and saw a small plainly dressed man walking rapidly toward me. Approaching, he accosted me in that peculiarly soft accent of my native Southlands:

"Are you the Southern Methodist preacher?"

"I am."

"I wish you to go out on the Estrella to-morrow, and perform the marriage ceremony for me; can you go?"

I thought a moment, and replied: "My horses are both barefooted just now, and the road out there I believe is very rocky."

"O!" he exclaimed, with the same ready business-like air which had marked every word he had spoken, and seemed part of the very man himself: "I will attend to all that—meet me to-morrow morning at Payne's stable, and I will furnish you conveyance—we must get off by six o'clock."

"All right sir, I will be on hand—what is your name."

"Bryan."

He walked away as hastily as he came. I stood looking at him for a while, wondering why he came to me out on the street there, how he knew me, why not some days earlier etc. The appearance of the man struck me. He seemed to be a mixture of Southern gentility and rough and ready California independence.

Turning away I entered a cottage near at hand on a pastoral call. Relating the circumstance, I learned that he was a Kentucky boy, nephew of a eminent merchant in San Francisco, and was acting in the capacity of agent on an immense sheep ranch, belonging to his uncle. He was to marry the only daughter of a neighboring rancher.

Six o'clock next morning found me, and my new friend, at Payne's stable. Two clean-looking buggies were driven out. I was alloted to one drawn by a pair of "half American" white horses; my friend took one drawn by a pair of mules. I wondered, but did not ask why the necessity of two buggies—I was not large and my friend was small.

The air was cool and crisp; the sky appeared in ... rock rested like a ... the peaks of the ... mountains. Just beyond the suburbs of the little old city, we entered a broad, beautiful canyon through which meandered a bold, limpid mountain stream, now gliding smoothly between willow-fringed banks, and then leaping wildly, with the roar of a mimic Niagara over an immense boulder, or down a granite ledge. The mountain-sides, were covered with a thick growth of wild sage, chemisal, weeds, tall grasses, dotted here and there with low thick-limbed live oaks. We passed an old water-mill, and several small mountain ranches. I believe these California mountain homes, are the only ones in California, that are really homelike, because I was reared in the country among timbor covered hills.

On we drove scarcely changing our gait up the long, broad, smooth, grade, over the divide, i. e. a lower place in the mountains, and out on a vast elevated plateau, sparcely covered with oaks and pines, dotted by pretty little hills, covered by a profusion of limpid crooks and one broad river, and skirted by a range of mountain-peaks, still taller than the one just crossed. Here we passed an ancient mission, changed into a stock rancho, and crowded with droves of horses and cattle, pastured on the greenest of fields. Three or four miles further on, we cross the shallow, broad bed of the Salinas river, and stop at the rancho-house of my friend for rest and dinner.

As the wedding had been wisely set for the afternoon, we dined early—11 A. M. was rather too early for me, notwithstanding the mutton-chops and the cakes, prepared by a French cook. About noon, we started again. Our road now lay over the low, broad hills, covered now with stunted brush wood, and now with dried grass, which, although so mature, had never been cut. We saw a pair of black-tailed deer; and although we drove fifteen miles through and over these hills and vales, we did not see the hint of a human dwelling until within a mile or two of our destination. Then we passed one house and saw a few men at work. About 3 P. M., we reached the home of the bride. It was a low, rudely built domicile consisting of three small rooms, built in a string, and a detached kitchen equally as plain and squatty. It was perched on an eminence overlooking the broad bottom of the Estrella, which though called a creek, was in fact what is generally in California called a river. We were met by a tall thin man with grizzled hair and beard, and tanned face and hands. He was quite plainly dressed and wore the air of a frontiersman. He gave the hearty free and easy welcome peculiar to his kind, and remote as I knew myself to be from civilization, I could but feel at home. Entering we found the house as neat as it was plain, and seemingly occupied only by this tall plain man, and a better-looking young woman who resembled him. My friend retired to another room, and after a few minutes, returned with this young woman and remarked, "We are ready Mr. Featherstun."

I looked around to see if there were to be any witnesses to this ceremony. I could only discover this tall grizzled man, who sat and looked on with an unconcerned air. I hesitated a moment, seeing no prospect of an addition to the audience, I proceeded. The ceremony over, the bride and groom having been overwhelmed with the press of congratulations from the company (?) retired—he I dont know where, but she to the kitchen; while the grizzled man proceeded to explain, why his wife, who had remained in the kitchen, refused to witness the ceremony. It was not because she was opposed to the union, or to the celebrant—all parties seemed to be perfectly satisfied. She was a devoted Romanist, and had reared her daughter in that faith. Two days before, Mr. Bryan had come in a buggy and had taken his affianced down to the old mission twelve miles distant to be married by the padre. The wily priest, after the manner of his kind, refused to marry a daughter of the church to a heretic, until said heretic shall have humbly signed an obligation, more exacting than delicate, to the effect that all the offspring of said union, should be baptised and instructed into the Romish Church. This my brave and independent Kentucky friend declined doing. "Why," says he, relating the circumstance to me, "I have a thousand kinsfolk in Kentucky and they are every one Methodists." The padre insisted; and my friend persistently refused.

"O! you will come to it," slyly remarked the padre; "John Wilson over here whom I married some weeks ago, talked pretty much as you do, but he yielded at length."

"But I will not" firmly replied Bryan.

"What," says the priest "will you lose your girl rather than sign this paper?"

"Do you positively refuse to perform this ceremony until I sign that obligation?

"I do," answered the padre.

"Good evening, padre," and my friend was gone, leaving the priest astonished and chagrined—he had gone a little to far; had lost his game when he felt it was most sure.

Bryan returned to the buggy where he had left his companion, and relating the conversation, said:

"Now, if you will consent I will take you back home, and leaving you there, will go to San Luis Obispo, and be back by 3 P. M., to morrow, with a minister who will marry us, though you be a Romanist and I a heretic."

Catching his spirit, she readily consented. The father and mother were equally indignant at the padre; but, the mother being the only one who was a communicant, and went to confession, fearing to incur the padre's disapprobation dared not witness or seemingly countenance, what she heartily endorsed. This double life of outward conformity, and inward rebellion is one of the legitimate fruits of Romanism. It is modernized Phariseeism.

Dinner followed the wedding as usual. On entering the kitchen where the feast was spread I was introduced to this careful dame. She was a good-looking stoutly-built motherly woman about half a century old, with the appearance of a lady, and the brogue and blarney of a biddy: she certainly first saw light in the Emerald Isle. The dinner was profuse and elegant. The fat turkey, and fatter mutton, the pies and the cakes of various shades and styles, presented a temptation of some dimensions, to my delicate stomach, which had dined three hours before. Wine was tendered as a matter of course, and as a matter of course declined. This seemed to disconcert our hospitable hostess. But I managed to impress her that we Protestant clergy felt it hardly consistent, for us to drink wine as a beverage.

Dinner was quickly followed by another ride back over the road we had come, Bryan's buggy now carrying two; I was still left lonely. Shortly after night-fall we reached Bryan's home, having driven forty-five miles, eaten two dinners and attended a wedding. Need I say that I slept that night without the need of a lullaby or rocker?

After a good breakfast next morning, I bade adieu to the bride and groom, and turned the heads of my milk-white steeds toward the sunset sea. By ten o'clock, they were stabled and I was at the parsonage relating my adventures.

A prominent member of that parsonage family, now at my side, suggests that, to her the most interesting feature of the Estrella Wedding was the forty dollars in gold which it netted me.

HEROIC FAITH.—The ventures of faith are ever rewarded. We cannot set our expectations from God too high. What we dare scarcely hope now we shall one day remember. When we come to tell the completed story of our lives, we shall have to record the fulfillment of all God's promises, and the accomplishment of all God's promises, and the accomplishment of all our prayers that were built on these. Here let us cry, "Be thy hand upon us." Here let us trust thy hand shall be upon us. Then we shall have to say, "The hand of our God was upon us." And as we look from the watch-towers of the city, on the desert that stretches to its very walls, and remember all the way by which he led us, we shall rejoice over his vindication of our poor faith, and praise him that "not one thing hath failed of all these things which the Lord our God spake concerning us."—Alexander McLaren, D. D.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

TRUE MERIT ALWAYS WINS.

There is a constantly increasing demand for Brown's Iron Bitters. A druggist on Washington street reports the sale of 23 bottles the first month; 86 the second month, and 146 bottles the third month; and not one complaint or failure to give entire satisfaction as being the very best health and life-giving medicine in all the world.

Our brother "In white," says the Texas Messenger, is attracting some attention from the thoughtful and prayerful. About time to give him "a lift." Who will help to educate and save him?

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON, March 14.—Debate upon the anti-polygamy bill continued until 2:30 o'clock, though the speeches were limited to five minutes or less. The discussion was quite interesting. Messrs. Carlisle of Kentucky, Tucker of Virginia, and Converse of Ohio, were the principal speakers in opposition to the bill, contending that it was unconstitutional and would serve to disorganize the government of Utah and turn it into a state of anarchy. For these reasons, and not because they were opposed to stamping out polygamy, they would vote against the bill. Messrs. Robeson, of New Jersey, and Haskell, of Kansas, advocated the bill, the latter charging that the Democrats had attempted to kill the bill by placing amendments upon it and burying it in the cloisters of a conference committee. Finally, the bill passed without amendment.

MONROE, La., March 14.—The situation here is extremely critical. A visit to the levees above and below the city this afternoon to-day showed both in great danger, though a large force was at work on both. The lower levee is cracked in several places, but breaks checked it. Mr. Tromard, in charge, says there are not five inches to spare. The water is oozing through the levee above in many places, with a large force under Mayor Endom working night and day to prevent a break. The river there is six feet higher than the bank and more than ten higher than in the rear of the city, where the overflow from the Mississippi is higher than in 1876, and is still rising. The river is rising at the rate of an inch in twelve hours, and the boat from Camden last night reported a rise all the way from there. The river is only three and a half inches below the flood of 1874. Nearly all of Trenton is under water. In some places it is three feet deep and business is suspended. The roads up and down the river are impassable and communications are only by water, and that but rarely. Planting along the river is suspended. Stock is huddled together and many animals are dying from starvation and from buffalo gnats, which are worse now than known for twenty years. They render plowing impossible, even with the use of oil.

YAZOO CITY, March 14.—The steamer E. C. Carroll, arriving here this morning from the Talahatchie and upper Yazoo, brings further accounts of damage done by the water. The rapid rising has made it impossible to get stock out, and thousands of hogs and cattle have been drowned. A passenger on the boat says he saw droves of the latter standing in water so deep that their heads could just be seen. One hundred and fifty mules were brought down, some of which were taken from swimming water. The DeSmet brought out one hundred and seventy-six yesterday. At one place on the Tallahatchie river, all the stock and people of the neighborhood are crowded together on a five-acre ridge that is being rapidly covered. As the people come in, the stock are forced off to give room. The situation is truly appalling.

VICKSBURG, Miss., March 14.—The river here has risen six inches in the twenty-four hours up to one o'clock to-day. The water has completely submerged the lower portion of the town, including the Vicksburg and Meridian railroad track. The compress is being rapidly inundated, and cotton in that establishment has been turned over to the owners, with a request that they take it from the press as soon as possible.

Delta, La., has become a waste of water and is bereft of nearly every inhabitant. The citizens are working vigorously on the levee in the rear of the town with the hope that they may be able to hold it intact and thus save the town. Water is rushing down Grant's canal, but the citizens of the town have ceased to be alarmed as to its serious aspect. It is feared, however, that if the levee in the rear of town give way a portion of the town will be blotted out.

PHILADELPHIA, March 14.—Telegrams from South Bethlehem, this morning, state that over one hundred cases of small-pox have developed since Sunday, and the excitement aroused yesterday continues unabated. On Saturday but three very slight cases were known to the health authorities. On Sunday, within two hours, fourteen houses were quarantined, and by Sunday night fifty cases broke out. This morning the cases are increasing in the most alarming manner. The air is thick with the fumes of tar; twenty barrels are burning at as many different points. Special police are sworn in to compel the strictest quarantine, and the fire department on duty constantly. Nearly all cases are in an unexceptionally clean section of the town, and nearly all the victims had not been vaccinated.

FORT WORTH, March 14.—A regularly organized band of train wreckers is operating in this State. Last evening a rail was removed from the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe track, fifty miles south of this place, on a high bank, and an express train going at the rate of twenty-five miles per hour passed over the ties, striking the track all right in front of the removed rail. The villians attempted to wreck a train on the Texas Central railroad near Palmer last Thursday. Efforts are being made to detect them.

NATCHEZ, March 14.—No crevass at Vidalia. Levee still intact, but water encroaching rapidly in the rear of the town, from back water and the breaking of Claremont levee yesterday.

VICKSBURG, March 15.—The Millikin's Bend levee still remains intact, but the people are working on it night and day. The levee in the rear of Delta gave way about three A. M., and the water rushed through such force that several small houses were carried away. A very large number of horses, mules, cows etc., were brought to this place last night and consigned to the different pastures in the country.

WASHINGTON, March 15.—The President has been notified by Judge Samuel Blatchford, of New York, of his acceptance of the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

ROME, Ga., March 16.—The body of Bud Harris, who has been missing since February 21, was found in the Etowah river this morning. A bottle of whisky and an empty flask were in his pocket. It is supposed to be a case of accidental drowning.

VICKSBURG, March 16.—The river has risen here, during the past twenty-four hours, one and one-half inches. This fall off in the rise, compared with yesterday, is accounted for by the breaks which occurred during the night and this morning in the levees above. The Millikin's Bend levee broke in four places; the breaks are very large. At Omega the break is supposed to be about six hundred yards wide, at Buckhorn fully one thousand yards, at Rose Hill seven hundred yards, at Morancey plantation one thousand yards. All the above breaks are in Madison parish, and within a space of twelve miles. The water will flood the entire parish. The levee at Ursino, on Davis Bend, broke last night. It is situated in front of Montgomery's store, and there is no doubt but that the whole island is under this time. The Cannon arrived about six A. M., bringing several families and a lot of stock. In fact every boat that lands here now brings people and stock from the different inundated sections. It is an impossibility to exaggerate the suffering. There are thirty-three breaks from Hushpuckana levee to Greenville.

LITTLE ROCK, March 16.—News was received to-day of the death of Dr. Henry E. Epperson a leading physician of Marion county. He died of small-pox, contracted while attending Dr. Cantrell, also a prominent citizen, and who died some days ago. This makes the third physician who has fallen a victim of the disease. There have been twenty-three cases of small-pox in Boone and Marion counties, and ten deaths. The scourge is reported abating.

VICKSBURG, March 18.—Gov. Lowry and Commissioner Hemingway were in the city to-day giving their attention to the needs of persons in the overflowed sections. Judging from the telegrams received by them, the whole country above and below here is submerged, and great destitution prevails in all quarters. The officers of the Paris C. Brown report passing three floaters below here. Business on the levee district here has been entirely suspended, and everything in the way of floating property has been brought into requisition for the benefit of the sufferers. Commissioners say that the whole country from Ellis's Cliff to Fort Adams is submerged.

MEMPHIS, March 18.—The Avalanche's Helena, Ark., special says: Latest advices from the upper St. Francis river are that the people in that section are almost reduced to cannibalism; they have eaten carcasses for some days, and now have all the appearance of people about to become insane from starvation.

MEMPHIS, March 19.—The river declined two inches, and is falling steadily at all points. At Helena, Ark., it fell two inches, and the outlook there is much brighter. As soon as the water ceases running throug the crevasses below that city the overflow can easily be drained from the city. The country south of here is swarming with buffalo gnats. Much stock that was saved from drowning by the overflow is being killed by these insects.

VICKSBURG, Miss., March 20.—The levee at Lovell's Palmyra landing gave way last night, and there is six feet of water in Lovell. The Ashwood levee, in Tensas parish, has also gone. The whole of Hurricane Island is now completely under water. Capt. Leathers expresses the opinion that in three days there will not be an acre of land in Tensas parish. Passengers on the White say the levee at Milliken's can not possibly hold out if there is any farther rise in the river. The steamer E. C. Carroll arrived this morning from Yazoo river. She has moved about one thousand horses and mules from the plantations on the river to Yazoo City. She reported the river on a stand at Tchula City. The water is rising in Delta, opposite this city; a strong current has set in through the principal streets, and old fences and outbuildings have been washed away. There is no truth in the report of a break at Milliken's Bend. The breaks are above and below the town. There are no breaks reported since my dispatch of half past five P. M. No lives were lost by the burning of Baer's store.

YAZOO CITY, Miss., March 20.—The water at this point is two feet above the 1867 mark; it has risen one inch in the last twelve hours. At this rate of increase it will reach its maximum point to-night or to-morrow morning. Boats from above report the water at a stand and the excitement subsiding, but each steamer brings people and stock.

A WONDERFUL

SCIENTIFIC

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

'GENTLY, TIME.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Touch us gently, Time!
Let us glide adown thy stream
Gently—as we sometimes glide
Through a quiet dream!
Humble voyagers are we,
Husband, wife and children three—
One is lost—an angel, fled
To the azure over-head.

Touch us gently, Time;
We've not proud nor soaring wings:
Our ambition, our content,
Lies in simple things.
Humble voyagers are we
O'er life's calm, unsounded sea—
Seeking only some calm clime—
Touch us gently, gentle Time.

Short Articles on Providence—No. 4.

There seems to me to be two radical mistakes in all theories relative to the providence governing the history of either Churches or States. 1. The first error is in the assumption (tacit indeed, but equally positive) that truth is only one form while error is multiform. Proteus is regarded as the mythic imposter who in his thousandth metamorphosis is still the personification of error and never of truth. With this assumption, dominant though latent, in the mind, it is easy to see how good men will often oppose the good—each declaring the other to be heretic, schismatic and often much worse. If a new church, or a new branch of the church, is started, its enemies must find a wrathful Providence who sent it as a plague, while its champions must find an excuse for its origin in some plan of Providence who is just raising the curtain upon another scene of the show.

Now, I hold that it is the order of Providence that forms of organization should come and go, just as men are born and die. The development of a new church, or a new order of political government is natural and must be expected in the course of events. The vitality of a system is directly as its tendency to branch out. There is such a thing as too much vigor often shown in this prolific tendency of both plants and churches. But an ism that has not vitality enough to send out off-shoots will never alarm the devil lest he may lose ground. This prolific quality of Protestantism has been one of the best evidences of its health. When each older form of Protestantism passes the fecund age, its matronly dignity may still continue to enlarge; but let it not forget that even that stately dignity is in part due to already advancing imbecility and final death. He who thinks that the next centennial will present the Methodism of to-day as the most vigorous type of evangelical Christianity is dreaming that institutions, abide as rocks—things to sit or stand on, and not the growth whose roots find their anchorage and sustenance in the clefts of the rocks.

The origin of Southern Methodism was not a moral convulsion that rent a continent. It was a legitimate and timely birth whose conception dated as far back as the days of Asbury and Coke. The latter would have stifled it in embryo if he could have done it; but not he nor Asbury, had he been like-minded, nor both, nor all the Church at that time had the power to do it. Providence did not want an apologist for slavery, nor an excuse for bringing the African to America. If this was all the Southern Church was for, then I must confess I am ready to wear mourning for her. She has nothing to do and she ought to absorb. But if, as I believe, the Southern Church and the ideas and principles that govern it have existed as long as Methodism in America, then I feel confident that she has a mission now as clear and imperative as the Church North. These principles do not rest on historical facts; but the facts of history have grown out of them. So far I agree with Dr. Kelley that the history of the separation has been repeated often enough; but those principles out of which it grew; the different modes of thought and sentiment of people generically diverse—these could not be legislated out of the way nor ignored till the Creator chose to reconstruct the leading mind and heart of the people.

2. The second error to which I wish to allude is the rebound of opinion from the first error to the opposite extreme. That is, when there is no question as to the establishment of a new form of doctrine, or one idea fairly prevails, we are apt to conclude that all our former notions were wrong, and under the "new light" we make more confessions than either consistency or God demands. It is lawful always to admit that the other side have good reason for their opinion, and it is always shallowness or insincerity to tell our new friends that our old ones are knaves or ignorammuses. Once we were never tired of talking of the arrangements of Providence for the pet of the day; the day and its pet both passed and something else appeared to have the ascendant. Accordingly we set about to explain how Providence had a "temporary" motive in it; but now he has shown us the real one. Thus Providence used us to gather and instruct in the rudiments of religion two hundred thousand negroes, eight-tenths of whom, at the first chance, left us for the mother church! I really think the dear mother ought yet to pass complimentary resolutions as to the fidelity of her wet-nurse! Yet there she has stood and vilified us while we were doing what Providence wanted done in the way of "needed tutelage" under "temporary parallax!" Of course it was in the order of Providence that these two hundred thousand converts should leave us! Of course it was in order that we should come to doctrinal issues that are alive to-day! Of course we should burn all history, enter into bankruptcy in everything except that "we thought we were right," but now "rejoice in the clearer light!"

But why enlarge upon this? We are not sure we see any better now than thirty years ago. We know now that we were mistaken in some things. Let us, however, not be so sure that we are altogether enlightened now, or that our Northern brethren are any nearer the truth than ourselves. Their number or present success is no proof.

Recollections of Bishop Wightman.

Although we deprecate hero-worship and the fashionable practice of praising the dead, we think it would be difficult to say too much in commendation of our lamented Bishop.

Though slander, the murderer of men's reputations, like the destroyer of their bodies, "loves a shining mark," she never dared to whisper a breath against the spotless name of the distinguished Christian gentleman in whose recent death the entire church is bereaved.

There are men whose very presence carries along with it an inspiration and an influence for good, and is a standing rebuke to everything that is wicked and degrading in its nature. Such a man was William May Wightman. In the autumn of 1859 the writer, in company with several other students, called on Dr. Wightman, at his residence in Greensboro, Ala., to consult about board and other things connected with the opening session of that, then promising, institution, the Southern University. As he entered the sitting-room in the peculiar, gliding, quick-moving gait, characteristic of him, and welcomed us with the singular grace and cordiality, for which he was distinguished, and took his seat, we felt that we were in the presence of a great man.

The new relation of teacher and pupil, that day inaugurated, lasted two years, and formed the basis of an attachment which lasted as long as the Bishop lived, and to the day of my death I hope to have grace to revere the memory and imitate the example of such men as Andrew and Wightman, with both of whom it was my high privilege to be well acquainted.

Of the Bishop's success and qualifications as an editor, the writer had not the opportunity, and if the opportunity, not the capacity, to judge. Of him as a preacher others have spoken. Suffice it to say his style was pure, his manners graceful, his voice musical and sweet, and, at times, he was very eloquent. After a lapse of more than twenty years there is an impression on my mind that usually about the middle of the discourse there towered a grand climax in which the leading thought of the subject was forcibly presented, or the main argument clinched, by a happy illustration. At such times his form, even then somewhat bowed, would straighten up, his eye kindle, and his countenance light up with heavenly ardor and glow of earnest zeal. As a teacher his object was to enforce the leading features of the system. His method was that of frequent reviews and lectures. Hickok's Mental Science and Moral Philosophy were at his tongue's end. At recitation he never opened a book. He, not unfrequently, went back to the very beginning and questioned the class on something gone over, consuming the entire hour, without ever touching the lesson for the day. In his sermons and lectures he sometimes appeared to hesitate for a word; but I have no idea he ever used a word in the wrong place in his life. "The right word was sure to come."

Bishop Wightman, was a perfect gentleman in the highest sense of the term. Chesterfield, himself, could not have surpassed him in politeness and the strict observance of the rules of the most approved system of etiquette and decorum. Scrupulously neat in his dress; of princely mien; he might, upon slight acquaintance, have been regarded as somewhat aristocratic in his notions and deportment. Such, however, was not the case. He was simply nature's nobleman, and the humblest acquaintance and plainest student was always recognized by a pleasing smile and courteous bow or military salute.

The Bishop was one of the most industrious men I ever knew. When not occupied with professional engagements he could be found in his library busy with his studies, or employed in manual labor improving and beautifying the premises about the college or his own residence. After the exercises of the day were over he has frequently been seen, spade in hand, digging holes for posts, nailing on pickets, or setting out shrubbery. He commanded the respect and esteem of the students, and whatever college prank or practical joke was played on the other members of the faculty by mischievous boys, the doctor was sure to escape. He appealed to the self-respect and manhood of his pupils, and they seldom betrayed the trust he reposed in them. On one occasion some thoughtless student stripped the curtains of the rostrum windows into strings, and suspended the table, on which lay the copy of the Scriptures, from the floor. When the hour for evening prayers arrived, and the faculty were seated on the stage and the boys in the chapel, the doctor walked to the front, and, in his measured tones and peculiar emphasis, quoted the passage of St. Paul—"When I was a child, I thought as a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things"—and quietly resumed his seat.

The kind father, the tender, considerate husband, the faithful teacher, the zealous preacher, the dignified, laborious presiding officer has gone to his reward. Peace to his honored dust. May his mantle fall on a worthy successor, and may we all meet him where no parting tear shall be shed and no farewells pronounced, is the wish of an old pupil.

The Universality of Christianity.

BY REV. ALDEN O. BROWN.

To translate some religions out of the countries where they prevail would be most surely to kill them. Where they were born and bred they must live and die. The magnolia will not thrive in Missouri or Indiana; an exotic must not be transplanted into Nova Zembla. What progress do you reckon Baboo Chunder Sin, the Indian, would make in converting London or New York or Paris to Buddhism? His efforts would be as futile as the man with an axe at the base of the mountain proposing to hew it down. The Buddhist religion is adapted to the Buddhist character, suits his peculiarities, and must remain on its native soil or meet with death at once. It can not leave home. Let a Hindoo missionary attempt to convert the old Puritan descendants of Boston and New England. What madness and folly! So soon as he leaves his native land he leaves all the elements and characteristics in which alone his religion can have vigor. He leaves the necessary caste of Hindooism, the national peculiarities which foster and nature it, as well as the traditional basis upon which the whole fabric rests. Absolutely, the Hindoo religion is for the Hindoo only: it has no elements of universality, and transplanted, it would wither and dry up at once. Mahometanism would fare equally as bad. In the land of the Orient, the Mahometan fasts and feasts; his prayers and praise are all regulated by the rising and setting of the sun. How he would proceed among the inhabitants of the Arctic circle where the days and nights are each six months in duration can not be easily imagined. Perhaps he would be nonplussed; at any rate he would long for another clime. His religion is too hot-blooded—full of too much fire and fret—for that cold, sluggish and cheerless people. The Olympic gods could find no home on our own Rocky mountains; nor could the Grecian priest keep life in his religion if he carried it beyond the zephyrs of the enchanted groves and mystic fountains of his sunny land. It would ill-suit the rough, burly and brawny civilization of this Western land—that religion taken from scented forests and jungle pools and marvelous art and glorious sculpture; a religion caught from Orpheus' lyre and siren's song and Venus' form. In Greece it was born and there it must die and be buried.

We challenge the world, however, to show a nook, a corner, a dell or dingle, one spot in all this wide, wide earth where Christianity—the religion of the Nazarene—may not make for itself a home, and suit man as man, and under any conditions. From pole to pole, amid the eternities of snow and ice or the sandblasts of perpetual heat, the story of the cross may be preached acceptably and with such power as makes it take hold of hearts and cling to them forever. The denizens of African jungles; the inhabitants of the snow-huts of Labrador; the fierce Arab; the æsthetic Greek; the pigmy Lapplander and grim New Zealand cannibal, each and all, can take it to their bosoms as the sweetest consolation, the gladdest hope that ever visited these sin-smitten fields of time or crossed their paths in life. Christianity proved itself in the land of its birth as a mighty victor; but on foreign soil it has achieved its mightiest conquests. It is not conventional nor local, not sectional nor limited by geographical lines; but world-wide in its character, and universal in its sympathy with the hidden and heart-life of mankind. It knows nothing of race, color, or previous condition; but comes as the Healer, the Friend, the Brother and Infinite Saviour. National peculiarities and personal or constitutional temperaments create no bar to its immediate entrance and its growing beauty. It neither creates nor requires caste distinctions, and can work with or without them. In the common hope and common joy that it sets forth all men may share and share alike. To institute a comparison of Christianity and Paganism, and depreciate the former, is cheap work and the folly of a half scholar; for a little study and an honest research will give to Christianity the crown of divinity, and elevate the Nazarene's system as high above the others as heaven is above hell.

AUGUSTA, ARK., March 4, 1882.

Letter from Texas.

MR. EDITOR: Our new State capitol will, it is thought, soon be well under course of erection. It is to cost, when completed something over two millions of dollars, and will be one of the handsomest structures of its kind on the American continent. Most, if not all, the material used is to be procured within the limits of the State. Texas limestone will compose the walls, the greater part of which has already been quarried from the hills near Austin and is now on the site. The contractors and architects are Western men, who are to receive as a consideration all those reserve lands in territorial grants known as "capitol lands." By this transfer they become the largest land syndicate in the world. These lands contain a sufficient area for the erection of several counties; and in the aggregate are larger than at least two of the Eastern States. A secular paper makes an interesting showing how the ownership of this vast territory could be turned to political account in the near future. It could be so manipulated as easily to secure two seats in the Congress, hold the balance of power in the State Legislature, and divide the honors of the National Senate. But this is all mere speculation—an Utopian fancy. The time is fast approaching when monopolies in lands must go to pieces. We have seen their wreck in Europe and the East; they begin to weaken in the Southeast, and the influence is beginning to be felt in the West. Honesty and toil entitle every man to a sovereign share of God's heritage, and the time comes when in orderly fitness baronial estates must be parted among the yeomanry for the legitimate consideration.

I have been not a little interested in the discussions on the subject of immigration in your paper carried on by some of the brethren in Mississippi. Immigration has it advantages and disadvantages. It advances the material interests of a country, but works woe and ruin to social morality. But there are great problems which must be solved. Perhaps there is no more excellent way than to let the nations come to our civilization. Perhaps it may be better to carry it to them.

Quite a number of distinguished gentlemen have been in the State and city during the past two weeks: among them Gen. Sherman, en route to the Western border; and Hon. Henry B. Payne, of Cleveland, en route to Mexico. The reception of Gen. Sherman and party, by the Mexican soldiery, as they dismounted from the first railway coach that ever crossed the Rio Grande, is represented as being full of imposing interest. Hon. Mr. Payne will be remembered as a prominent candidate for the Presidency before the late Democratic convention. To a News reporter he expressed himself as being charmed with everything he saw South; and more than ever drawn towards its people; and more than ever convinced that his estimate of their worth and patience was just.

Value of a Good Family Newspaper.

Dr. John E. Edwards, writing in the Southern Christian Advocate, says:

A good family newspaper is an educator in the household circle. It supplies the place of the circulating library, and, in many instances, is even better than a library. There are thousands who have little, if indeed any time for reading books, who nevertheless have short intervals of leisure for reading paragraphs and short articles in the family paper. The [illegible] of a good weekly will [illegible] with the current news secular and religious, but will acquire a large and well-assorted stock of information upon a wide range of literary and scientific subjects; glances over the articles and paragraphs that fall under the eye, can not fail to gather up the material that will make one a well-informed person. A few minutes conversation with any one will reveal the fact whether he or she is a regular reader of a good weekly paper. There may be but few, if any books of recent date in the house, and yet, if there is a good family paper the inmates will be far better informed, on all current matters, than a family with a library crammed with old books, and yet without the paper. This will be observed by every pastor who visits from house to house, either in country or the city. But I refer, just now, more especially to our church papers. They are the educators of a large portion of our membership. It is painful and deplorable to witness the ignorance, the positive ignorance, of very many of our church members in relation to our own church, its government, institutions, publications, missionary work, Sunday-school labor, etc. This ignorance might be relieved and enlightened by the weekly visits of one of our Advocates. Why are we not more energetic and persistent in our efforts to get one of our papers into every Methodist family? There is no investment that could be made by a pastoral charge, or by a Conference, or by the whole church that would pay as well as a fund set apart to supply all that are unable or unwilling to subscribe for themselves, with a copy of any of the Advocates. It would increase knowledge and with this there would be a corresponding increase in our church enterprises, and an increase of liberality in the support of the ministry, with a growing interest in our missionary, Sunday-school and educational work. Take any circuit where a church paper is widely circulated and compare its reports with another circuit of of equal membership and ability where but few copies of a church paper are read, and what I have indicated will be apparent. We need the silent but potent educator in our Methodist families. It would make our people wiser, better, more influential. What steps can be taken by a Conference to get an Advocate in every family? Can a special fund be raised to apply to this object? My observation as a pastor for many years convinces me that a good church paper in a family is invaluable as an educator, and indispensable as an adjunct to the highest efficiency in the church work.

The Egyptian Discoveries.

No little excitement was caused, about six months ago, by the discovery of numerous royal mummies and other royal memorials in a cave near Thebes. It was hoped that the history of Egypt, contemporaneous with the lives of Joseph and Moses would now be recovered—the Egyptian version of it at least. Among the remains was said to be the mummy of Rameses II., supposed to be the Pharaoh of Exodus. It was claimed, indeed, that such a discovery would contradict the Bible, which was quoted as declaring that Pharaoh was drowned. This, however, is not an accurate quotation. The narrative in Exodus affirms that "the Egyptians perished in the waves," "Pharaoh's horsemen and chariots," but makes no reference to the death of Pharaoh. In Psalm 136 it is said that God "overthrew" Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea; but an army may be "overthrown," may be utterly defeated, without being all killed. The finding of Pharaoh's mummy would involve us in no critical or historical difficulties. As a matter of fact, no remains of Rameses II. are included in the "find" at Thebes—not to insist on the admitted doubt whether he is properly identified with the Pharaoh of the oppression.

But much has been discovered of very great interest. The oldest mummy found is that of Ra-Suken, the petty king of Thebes at the time that Apopi, the Hyksos King of Avaris, was the Pharaoh of all Egypt. It was during the reign of these kings that Joseph is supposed to have been carried into Egypt. The mummy of Aahmes, and of his Queen, the founders of the eighteenth dynasty; that of Thothmes II. and III., the latter "the Alexander the Great of Egypt," who reigned fifty-three years, made thirteen successful campaigns in twenty years, and filled the land with monuments; and of several others extending into the twenty-first dynasty, promise to reveal much that has been till now hidden, throwing light on disputed points of history and chronology. Some time will be required to translate the inscriptions, which are in competent hands, and will be reported of in due season.

There is reason to doubt whether we are beyond the threshold of discovery in the East. The Shaitic is not the last biblical manuscript to be found in unexplored monasteries, nor is the last Pharonic inscription unrolled. Other graves will open to disclose their secrets, other cavern will be rifled, and things long forgotten will be brought into living memory. These significant discoveries seem like anticipations of the completer revelations to be looked for at the appearing of the Son of Man.—Watchman, Boston.

Monument to Bishop Wightman.

To the Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Dear Brethren: We believe that we give expression to the desire of the entire church in proposing to erect a monument over the grave of our beloved Bishop Wightman. His record is complete, and he needs no honors at our hands. In erecting a monument we honor ourselves, and we doubt not there are many throughout the length and breadth of our Southern land who, having been the beneficiaries of his ministerial labors, will now deem it a privilege to contribute their mite to such an object.

We do not call for large amounts from any one person; preferring that a general contribution from the whole church should attest the esteem and affection in which the memory of our departed Bishop is held.

With this view, we respectfully ask that this appeal be inserted into the several papers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; and that the itinerant preachers throughout the connection act as agents in receiving and forwarding contributions to the undersigned. Dr. H. Baer, treasurer, Harvey Cogswell, T. A. Johnson, Rev. A. Coke Smith, Rev. S. A. Weber, committee.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Feb. 28, 1882.

Good Words.

Have hope! Though clouds environ round,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow,
No night but hath its morn!

Have faith! Where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this: God rules the hosts of heaven
The inhabitants of earth.

Have love! Not love alone for one,
But man, as man, thy brothers call
And scatter, like the circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

—Schiller.

—Truly, to me, this consideration, that God's mercy is new every morning, so his grace is renewed to me every minute; that it is not by yesterday's grace that I live now, but that I have my daily bread, and my hourly bread, in a continual succession of his grace; that the eye of God is upon me, though I wink at his light, and watches over me, though I sleep; that God makes those returns to my soul, and so studies me in every change—this consideration infuses a sweeter verdure, and imprints a more cheerful picture upon my soul, than any one act, done at once, can minister unto me. Dr. Doane.

—Stars shine brightest in the darkest night; torches are better for heating; grapes come not to the proof till they come to the press; spices smell the best when they are bruised; young trees root faster for shaking; gold looks brighter for scouring; juniper smells sweetest in the fire; the palm-tree proves the better for pressing; chamomile, the more you tread it, the more you spread it. Such is the condition of all God's children. They are most triumphant when most tempted; most glorious when most afflicted.—Bagatzy.

—When we speak of joy we do not speak of something we are after, but something that will come to us when we are after God and duty. It is the rest of confidence, the blessedness of eternal light and overflowing confidence, the highest form of spiritual light and majesty. Rising from within it is sovereign over all circumstances and hindrances. Dr. Bushnell.

—Nothing is eternal, but that which is done for God and others. That which is done for self dies. Perhaps it is not wrong; but it perishes. You say it is pleasure; well, enjoy it. But joyous recollection is no longer joy. That which ends in self is mortal; that alone which goes out of self into God lasts forever.—F. W. Robertson.

Show me what thou wilt have me to do. As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are thy ways higher than our ways. We are impatient, for our life is but for a moment. Thou art from everlasting; therefore is thy patience full of long-suffering. O Lord, I adore thee! Thou hast made me for thyself, and I am forever thine.—Fenelon.

—Teaching men morals is as though I had a clock that would not go, and I turned round one of the cog-wheels. But faith takes the key and winds up the mainspring, and the whole thing runs on readily.—Spurgeon.

—Man is capable of greater suffering than any other creature on earth, but he is capable of higher and intenser enjoyments, and that simply because he is a man and not merely an animal. He must suffer to be great; he must conquer himself and the world in order to be forever mighty.

—Depend upon it, in the midst of all the science about the world and its ways, and all the ignorance of God and his greatness, the man or woman who can say, "Thy will be done," with the true heart of giving up, is nearer the secret of things than the geologist and theologian.—George MacDonald.

PERFECT LOVE.

BY C. O. A.

Sweet Beulah-land, of perfect love,
Where glorious landscapes, just above,
Are seen by eye of faith;
The telescopic view is grand,
All bathed in light on every hand.

O! perfect love, the breath of heaven,
The atmosphere, where joy is given,
The noon-day of the soul;
Where all is light, the perfect day,
Where every sin is washed away,
By cleansing blood made wholy.

Where God is seen, by faith's clear eye,
Upon the earth and in the sky—
A presence everywhere;
To mark the motions of our will,
And every storm of passion still,
By calling us to prayer.

And while we pray the tempter flies,
And sinful motion quickly dies,
And all is sweet, sweet calm;
The waves lie still, and all is peace,
And thus we find a quick release,
From God's all-healing balm.

Oh! perfect love, thou gift of God,
So often promised, in his word,
To every Christian here,
To feel and know themselves forgiven,
To have a foretaste here of heaven,
Unmixed with doubt or fear.

Oh! God! thou God whom Christians love,
Send forth thy Spirit like a dove,
To brood upon the soul;
And let his warmth create desire,
And then will fall celestial fire,
And sinners be made whole.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN ERENER.

Second Quarter—Lesson II.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1882.—MARK VI, 14-29.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The wicked plotteth against the just."

THE POWER OF CONSCIENCE TO REWARD OR CONDEMN, AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE MARTYR DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

In our lesson we have a scenic illustration of the power of conscience to reward or condemn, according as the conscience has been good or evil.

The holy Spirit has preserved this drama in all its tragic details of blood and death as carefully as he has that other drama of blood in which another martyr died, and in which all who were concerned as actors met a tragic death. Indeed, the tragic death of John comes in as a side scene in the act of redemption. The friend of the Bridegroom and the Bridegroom die in circumstances not unlike. He was a forerunner of the Lord even in the manner of his death. Being dead, he yet speaketh, for the holy Spirit has recorded his death, in all its circumstances, for the instruction of future ages.

We take up the persons dramatis in the act. John the Baptist was born five years before Christ—a child of prophecy. He lived, to the age of thirty, in retirement in the wilderness. He began his ministry, and preached for two years, when he was imprisoned by Herod in a dungeon. Here he existed a year, when he was murdered by order of Herod, to please the loathy fancy of a dancing girl, and to satisfy the jealous hate of a wicked woman.

Herod Antipas was one of the sons of Herod the Great, at whose death he was left heir to the fourth part of his kingdom, and became Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. He was unlike his father in all good traits of character, and transcended him in all the evil traits. A more cruel, scheming, irresolute, cowardly princeling never disgraced a throne nor ever afflicted a people, a type of the worst tyrants, and a conscientious monster, whose superstitious fears did not hold him back from the criminal indulgence of a violent will.

Herodias was his so-called wife, who, to gratify her inordinate ambition to be a queen, agreed to leave her husband, Herod's brother, Philip, and be the wife of Antipas, on condition that he would divorce his present wife, Aristas, an Arabian Princess. In short, she was a woman who would be willing to live in sin of any kind to wear a crown. She stopped at nothing, be it incest, murder, disgrace, or any other fearful alternative to satisfy her thirst for rule. Salome was the true daughter of this Lucretia Borgia, of sacred history, a daughter worthy of such a mother, a young and lustrous beauty, who could dance divinely. The mother and daughter, stripped of their court attire, were a pair of furies. This whole account of the tragedy is brought out to give a reason for a curious opinion Herod held concerning Christ. When the fame of Jesus reached his palace he no doubt asked many questions about him, who this Jesus might be. Some said he was Elias, and others said this is that prophet expected; but Herod had a different solution, and confidently answered his own question. This is John the Baptist, whom I beheaded; he is risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him. What an idea for this Sadducee! Has some great trouble changed him from a disbeliever in the resurrection to a believer in the transmigration of souls, that he should think that the spirit of the murdered John has arisen to animate this person Jesus? One flash of conscience has destroyed his whole creed; he finds that there is a resurrection, and this Jesus is John arisen from the dead. Singular and terrible conceit to guilty Herod! Hast thou found me, Oh! my enemy. It is to explain this strange opinion of Jesus, entertained by this superstitious Sadducee that the account is given, in which we have the workings of an evil conscience when goaded by the stings of remorse. The cause of John's imprisonment was his fearless non licet uttered in the presence and hearing of Herod. This man of stern truth, strong from his long wilderness drill, had no fear of man in his heart, and, when occasion offered, was not slow to fasten guilt upon the King. He had no soft words for royal sins. John faced the flushed monarch with his awful non licet: it is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. He showed him the law, and called his attention to each count it held against him, and made him feel the law's danger covered him. You may depend that in case Herodias was not present at this interview, that there were those who reported to her the charge of this fearless man, and she felt that she was not only in the same danger, but in danger of having the crown torn from her guilty brow by the potent influence of this holy man over her superstitious lord. She feared that his calm words might yet have more influence over Antipas than even her fading charms. He became her rival. She was jealous of his influence; she hated him for his very purity, and the hate of jealous woman is only satisfied with death.

She would have killed him, but she could not, for Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and a holy. Oh! the power of a just and holy man. He stands championed by the eternal law of justice, which engages all its majesty in his defense. "And observed him;" that is, watched him closely, and kept him safe from the cruel hate of his guilty consort, for he knew that once she had him in her power, his already precarious existence would have a sudden close. "He heard him gladly." How a thoroughly wicked man hankers after the truth; he is forever dabbling in Scripture, and setting off his villanies by a border of the spiritual, which only bring out his vice in blacker hues. "Did many things." What did he do? Give him better prison fare, order more straw for his pallet in the dungeon; did he stop his oaths? did he give up any of his lesser vices? I know not what these many things were, but one thing he did not do, and that was dismiss that guilty woman, and give up his own life of incestuous sin. Men now otherwise sinning often try to compromise with conscience by doing many things, at the same time reserving to themselves one darling sin—keep back part of price; they lie to the Holy Ghost, and to their own conscience.

Thus between Herod's superstitious fear of John, and real fear of the people, who looked upon John as a prophet, and the insatiable hate of Herodias, the prophet of God led a precarious existence in the damp dungeon of Machaerus, from which he saw no way of escape save through the gates of death.

But what Herodias could not gain through her own passionate charms she hoped to gain by shrewd machinations. She did not have to wait long. Hate is the mother of many inventions. The convenient day was coming when she hoped to have her wish. Herod's birth-day was near, when he would have his annual birth-day feast with his lords and high captains. This would be her occasion for sweet revenge. The plan was conceived with a skill infernal in its subtility. She would furnish a rare entertainment for Herod. She was certain that Herod would be pleased to have the rare luxury of having the Princess dance for him and his guests. This would be an unanticipated ending to his feast. To have the beautiful Salome honor them by taking the part of a ballet dancing girl. The daughter was an apt scholar under her mother's teaching, and played her part well.

The result was just what the schemer expected. After the feast was over, and the guests were sipping their wine, music was heard, and in a moment appeared Salome, dressed in gauze and stockinette, and in glittering beauty performed, in the presence of all, what would be styled in this day a heavenly step; in other words, degraded herself into scenic dancer, to the unbounded delight of this half-intoxicated company. Herod was pleased, and like mother, Xerxes, in a drunken delirium, with an oath, said unto the damsel: "Ask whatsoever thou wilt and I will give it thee, unto half of my kingdom."

She skipped over to her mother and said, what shall I ask? The mother had the answer ready long before this moment. Her reply was enough to freeze the blood of any other one but the daughter of such a woman. The head of John the Baptist. See her skip back to the King, and, in hearing of all, state her request. She came straightway with haste unto the King (her feet swift, to shed innocent blood,) saying: I will that thou give me, in my own fair hand, in one of the dishes, the head of John the Baptist. The indecent haste, the horrible request, the exquisite wickedness of the demand brought the King to his sober senses, and overwhelmed him with grief. Yet for his oath's sake—nice sense of honor—he commands the executioner to bring the head. They had not long to wait. The head came in on the dish; it was borne to Salome, and she carried it to her mother. Think you any one of those who witnessed this scene ever forgot that head? Was the sentence, "it is not lawful for thee," still frozen upon his cold lips? Herod never did forget; that head was never long absent from his palace, and John dead was more awful than John living. The lessons are many in this tragedy. One flash of the light of conscience can sweep away all creeds founded on falsehood. A [illegible] conscience makes one see ghosts. Yea, the wounded conscience begets worms that die not, and fire that is not quenched. A good conscience is heaven, an evil one is hell. John died, but what a welcome guest. Herod died in unpitied exile and terrors indescribable. John is the illustration of a good conscience, a just man and a holy—just, right with man; holy, right with God. See how he lives and dies. Herod is the illustration of the unjust and unholy man, the evil conscience.

From the Work.

PORT GIBSON, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: Another revolution of the itinerant wheel, and here we are in Port Gibson. At the mention of this name what memories of men, famous in the annals of Mississippi Methodism, are evoked. Here were the homes of the Jeffries, Humphreys, Bridgers, and a host of others. Here is the home of Rev. John G. Jones, the eldest living member of the Mississippi Conference. Some of these have passed away, but their descendants are still living hereabout. Here is located that historic institution, the Port Gibson Collegiate Academy (recently changed to college,) from whose halls have gone forth many of our most useful, pious and cultivated ladies. It has been doing a good work, and I trust now is renewing its youth, and entering upon a career of usefulness to the church, and the world, hitherto unattained. Its new president seems to be moving along smoothly, and making some progress in building up the institution. Everything seems to be wearing a brighter aspect, the skillful touch of the painter is seen here and there, new fencing has been put up, new furniture has been supplied, but the most encouraging feature is the increase of pupils. Though I have no figures at command, I think there are about one hundred in attendance. When we have our railroad to Vicksburg completed (which is already within five miles of this place,) we will be able to draw patronage from the rich Yazoo valley, and, as we already have a daily train to Grand Gulf, we are expecting more extensive patronage from the west side of the Mississippi river. Bro. Bradford is well qualified for the presidency of the college, and is justly hopeful of success. We have located here also the Chamberlin and Hunt Academy for boys; it is in a prosperous condition, about one hundred pupils in attendance. It is a Presbyterian institution, presided over by Prof. Locky, a man eminently qualified for the position. He has a fine corps of assistants. So you see, Mr. Editor, we are not behind in the matter of schools. We can recommend these institutions of learning to all who wish facilities for educating their sons and daughters. We have a cotton factory on paper. We may say, with Bro. Mathews, it is "on a boom." Bids for the site for the mills have been received by the Board of Directors, who are among our most substantial, energetic and enterprising citizens.

Over $40,000 have already been subscribed, and more is coming. We confidently expect to hear the sound of the loom and spindle in our midst before the end of the year. At no distant day we expect railroad communication with Crystal Springs or Wesson, and then we will have our Annual Conference here, and I extend to you now a most cordial invitation. Well, no doubt you wish to hear something of the prosperity of our Zion. We have one of the finest church buildings outside of Natchez, large and roomy, an intelligent and appreciative congregation, a Ladies' Aid Society, who own the parsonage, in the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and are constantly looking after the comfort of the preacher and his family. Congregations are large for this place, serious and attentive, which to the good sower is an encouraging feature, for we know that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and with his blessing is the production of fruit. You know that it is said: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow." A former member of the church at this place died, and left a legacy to the church, the interest of which is paid to the pastors of the church each year. "Though dead, he yet speaketh," and his works are continually following, and admonishing others of wealth to go and do likewise. Does such a man need a marble tablet in the church to keep his name in continual remembrance? Nevertheless, it is suggested by a grateful community, to show their appreciation of the generous deed.

PINEVILLE CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Notwithstanding the floods and overflow, we are having good times on the Pineville circuit. At every service since we began the labors of the present year we have had manifestations of God's willingness to bless. We have had nine accessions to the church since Conference. Our prayer meetings have been deeply spiritual, and the congregations have been almost as large as at the regular preaching hours; and another encouraging feature is that our people attend class meeting, and speak freely of their doubts, fears, hopes and triumphs. I suppose we had fifty persons present at class meeting last Sunday, and indeed, sir, it was a class meeting after the old sort.

And another encouraging feature is the kindness and love the good people have manifested to us since beginning the labors of the year. We had rather a surprise to-day; indeed, sir, we were literally stormed by the good ladies of Pineville. At four P. M. they began to come, first by twos, then by fours, and finally they just poured in from all quarters, Episcopalians, Baptists and Methodists, each one bearing, or having borne, an ominous basket or package, which was duly deposited in the dining-room, until we began to be a little puzzled as to where we would deposit the next basket or box that should come in. For the first time since we have been living in the Pineville parsonage the good wife complained of the smallness of the store-room. It is needless to add that neither the preacher nor wife had words sufficient to express their gratitude.

We are looking forward to a year of hard work, but rich in precious fruits.

Yours truly,

J. L. P. SHEPPARD.

PINEVILLE, LA., March 16, 1882.

SHUBUTA, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: We have been busy since our arrival at Shubuta. We are pleased with the outlook. Everything seems to be working favorably for the church. Our prayer meetings is beginning to be well attended. Congregation good and attentive. People seem interested in their pastor, and providing well for him; everybody kind and considerate. We hope to have a glorious revival later in the spring. We are moving and laboring to that end. We feel contented and happy, and hope to win many souls to Christ this year, and greatly build up the church. Dr. West dropped in on us this week, looking well and cheerful. He reports his district in good working order. He has a host of friends here, who gave him a hearty greeting. He joined in wedlock the daughter of an old friend of his—Mr. Champenois. We expect to send up a list of subscribers soon to the ADVOCATE. The ADVOCATE is held in high appreciation by all who read it. Some say it is the best among all the family of Advocates. We can not do without it. May our Father bless you, and give you great success in your work.

Obituaries.

LEDYARD.—MRS. CARRIE LEDYARD, daughter of Rev. J. T. and Mrs. Martha Heard, was born August 21, 1846, at Summerfield, Ala., and died suddenly at Shubuta, Miss., January 30, 1882. Professed religion and joined the church at the age of ten during the year 1856. Sister Ledyard was one of the most dutiful of children, loving and adoring her parents always; kind, considerate and thoughtful of their wishes; delighting to make them happy; thus she bloomed beautifully into womanhood, adorning the profession which she made in childhood. In the year 1869, February 18, she was married to Mr. Thomas Ledyard, and as wife was all that her husband could desire; possessing a soul full of love, her affections were bestowed without restraint and her confidence without fear; having a disposition flowing with tenderness, amiableness, kindness, gentleness and considerateness, her home was full of beauty and attractiveness, and her companionship a luxury indeed, as almost every hope of married bliss was realized. She was a queen. Her throne, the heart and home of her husband, was never menaced by foes without nor within. "Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also he praiseth her." As mother she was watchful and devoted, ruling without oppression, leading the little ones up into the ways of righteousness that their lives might be pure and useful; literally bringing them up to the nurture an admonition of the Lord. Her influence was as precious ointment. The hallowed impressions can never be forgotten. The impress of a godly mother hath been made upon her household. As a friend, true, unselfish, confiding; hence to know her was to love her and take her into friendship's holiest and purest tie. As a Christian her life was beautiful, charming and grand. In it was order, harmony, consistency, consecration and purity—the very elements essential to Christian character. From cradlehood she was taught to love Christ and do right; hence it was not strange that the little girl of ten beautiful summers gave her heart to God and began that lovely unfolding of Christian character that was so charming to all who knew her. Although she made no noise in the world, the impress of her godly life was left upon the community in which she lived and died. It was her delight to be at work in her Master's vineyard. In the Sabbath-school she was perfectly at home and was always present to perform her part. She had for many months been rendering valuable service in giving instruction to the Bible class. By kindness she sought to win many hearts and sow precious seeds that they might bring forth fruit to eternal life. The Wesleyan Society, over which she had presided so long, had a fond place in her heart; her strength, energy and influence were given to it. She found much delight in making the pastor's home comfortable and pleasant, and in seeing that all his wants were supplied. She was diligent in visiting the sick and in administering to the wants of the needy. Whatsoever her hands found to do, she applied them thereto, taking pleasure in rendering all the service in her power to the cause of Christianity. Such a life of usefulness. How blessed and fruitful! What a vacuum death hath made in our ranks! Who shall fill it? It is said the whole area of the ocean feels the effect of a single pebble cast therein, or, still more wonderful, that all the sounds ever uttered are still floating in the air, and its present state is just the aggregate of all these sounds. If these things be true they furnish us an emblem of the effects of such a life and character as that of Sister Ledyard; effects whose power shall ever be felt on earth, and shall stretch out into eternity and operate in joy forever. Such a life is blessed far above rubies, gold, or kingdom, and the work of making it the noblest work of earth.

W. D. DOMINICK.

TOMB.—Injustice has been done to the memory of a good man, in that nothing has been written for the ADVOCATE in regard to the life and death of ANDREW S. TOMB, so long a resident of Jackson, La., and so long an efficient member of the Methodist Church. He died at his home at 12 M., on Sunday, August 28, 1881. He was born in Ballaghey, County Derry, Ireland, and came to this county in early manhood. His age is not exactly known; but he was threescore years and ten, perhaps beyond it. The greater part of his life was spent in Jackson, La. There he reared a family; there he amassed a handsome fortune which was unfortunately swept away from him in his old age; and there he established a character for kindness, uprightness and truth that was challenged by no one. He was foremost in every good work, and, while possessed of means, was prominent in support of the church and in promoting all charitable objects. For the poor he ever had the tenderest sympathy, and neglected no opportunity to relieve them when in his power. Even after he was reduced in circumstances, scarcely able to meet the necessities of his family, he came to me with a small sum of money, saying: "I have been thinking that our church ought to keep a fund in your hands for the relief of the poor, and I will begin it by contributing this mite. May the good Lord largely increase it!" Though the sum was a small one it cost him self-denial to give it, and it showed a spirit of benevolence which would have applied as well to thousands or millions had they been in his possession.

His place in church was near the pulpit, and it was never vacant except providentially. For many years it had been his custom to pass the contribution plate through the congregation, in which no one made larger deposits than himself when in affluence; when his reverses came and he was no longer able to contribute largely, he said he felt a kind of humbled pleasure in being permitted to pass the plate, as that was the only way left him to serve the church. Once he exulted in being a leader in the good work, and now the same spirit of devotion to the Master's cause made him still eager to do what he could. He highly prized the privilege of the class meeting. He often used the petition in his public prayers: "Lord send us always a pastor who will keep up the class meeting." His related experiences were never ecstatic, never amounted to a full assurance of faith; but were always characterized by the deepest humility and most fervent desires; often he would break down from the overflowings of his full heart. He prayed regularly in his family, and the services were not merely perfunctory; but he entered into them with joy, and from them derived strength. With him religion was not simply a Sunday matter. It accompanied him every day, giving fruitness to his trades, sanctifying his sorrows, and making the whole of life to be a means of grace.

A chronic disease gave him warning in full time to set his house in order. He was perfectly resigned to death, and frequently gave vent to exclamations of triumph. On being asked several times during his illness if he was ready to die, he replied: "I am perfectly resigned; but if it is God's will I should like to see my pastor once more." Dear old friend, your confidence and affection are a great comfort to me! I will strive to live so as to be worthy of your love in a purer realm.

C. O. ANDREWS.

REGAN.—The subject of this brief notice was born in North Carolina, September 12, 1816, and moved from there to the State of Georgia, Houston county, when about five years of age, and remained there until the year 1829, when he moved with his stepfather, Reddick Bryan, to Ellenville parish, (then Claiborne,) La.

Bro. JOHN REGAN was a subject of converting grace in early life, having joined the Methodist Episcopal Church when a small boy. He lived a consistent Christian up to the time of his death, February 7, A. D. 1882.

Bro. Regan was one of our most substantial citizens, and a consistent, faithful Christian. As a husband, father, Christian or citizen, he was always true to all the obligations which these varied relations in life brought upon him. His Christian life and character had such an influence over his children as to cause them to embrace Christianity early in life. His moral influence in the community was great. He commanded the respect of both old and young. Though naturally timid and reserved, he was always ready to bear his part of the burden of the prayer and class meetings. Having been a class leader for many years, of course he was a great advocate of those meetings. He was regular in his attendance at the house of God, and was always so full of love that when called on to pray or speak his voice would often fail him, and his eyes would fill with tears of rejoicing.

In his last sickness his sufferings were great. He was confined to his house and bed about six months. Although having the best medical aid, he found no relief for his bodily suffering until he applied to the great Physician above.

For the last three weeks of his life he complained of but little pain, but seemed to be conscious that his time on earth would soon come to an end. He was often interrogated with regard to his spiritual condition, and always expressed himself perfectly resigned to the will of the good Lord; willing to live and suffer, or die and be at rest. In the morning, a few hours before his final exit, he called his sorrowing companion to his bedside, and told her that he felt a great change had come over him, and thought that the end was near, that he would not be here much longer, and requested her to stoop down and kiss him for the last time. In a few moments he seemed to be unconscious to all outside influences. He was fully ripe for the harvest, and the angels found him ready. May his manly fall on his only surviving son, and may his upright and Christian life be a great incentive to his sorrowing family and friends to greater earnestness and zeal in the cause of the Master.

T. C. BRYAN.

ROGERS.—MRS. SARAH A. RODGERS, whose maiden name was Waters, was born in Newbury county, S. C., November 2, 1827, and departed this life January 7, 1882, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She was married to Mr. Simeon G. Rodgers, in the State of Georgia, 1845. They moved to Dallas county, Ala., 1853; from Dallas to Monroe county, 1861; and from thence to Wilcox county, of the same State, 1867, where she made ashes to ashes below with the fond hope of a blissful immortality.

She was converted and joined the Methodist Church when young. Having embraced religion in early life, her faith seemed to grow with her, and her chief desire was to seek that help alone that would aid her in accomplishing good. To this end her life was filled with anxious care, especially for those of her own family. She read much and thought much for one of her opportunities. She had trials unlike those of most women, and does sorrows not akin to those of most mothers; but, with humble patience and Christian fortitude, she could bear them all, and would only say of those who would impose the heaviest strokes: "They do cause me much trouble."

The last five or six years of her useful life was spent in earnest toil and patient care for the welfare of those committed to her care as boarders at school. In this respect her untiring energy and unabating zeal for the cause of education is not easily surpassed. By her death the church has lost one of its most faithful and unfaltering members; her family, its most loving and affectionate jewel in all respects as wife, mother and Christian; the community one of its most kind and hospitable supporters.

After a career of faithful and unflagging usefulness she became a great sufferer with that most fatal disease—consumption; but, with the same Christian-like disposition, she was prepared for the struggle, and, after all was done that could be done by friends and physicians for her recovery, she quietly yielded all into the hands of him whose rod and staff ever comfort, fearing no danger, but whispered back to her grief-stricken companion and friends: "I have but one more river to cross, and then I shall be with my blessed Jesus."

GEO. WATSON.

BOWDEN.—Died at the residence of her father, in Franklin parish, La., February 1, 1882, aged eight years, two months and six days, little LOTTA, daughter of Col. L. H. and Mrs. Mary Bowden.

I knew her well and loved her much, for she had every lovable quality that could adorn the person and the character of a child. When I was pastor of Bloeuf Prairie Church in 1878, she would sit by her mother and listen more attentively than many grown persons, and on returning home could repeat more of the sermon, though she was then but five years old. When I was at her father's house she loved to linger near and hear me tell and sing of him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

She seemed supernaturally good, and that something in her character that was superior to nature was grace—the grace of the Holy Spirit who ever had her in his sacred charge and under his sanctifying influence. During the last week of her life she said: "I want to join the church as soon as I am old enough. I am going to get grandma to read and explain the rules to me, and when I understand them I will join the church and I will never leave it." She was sick some thirty hours with congestion of the lungs, and was rational to the last. Some hours before she died she asked her aunt—Mrs. Dr. Baldridge—to sing. While she sang, "I want to be an angel," little Lotta smiled, then closed her eyes and listened. After a little she looked up and said, "Mamma, I am going, going to leave you, mamma." Just before she died she pointed up and said, "See, see! thousands, thousands!"

Thus passed away one who appeared, to those who knew her best, to be a spirit in whom there was no guile, no spot, no blemish. Certainly the bright lamp of her beautiful little life was not lighted in ashes here, with so lovely a radiance, for so short a time, and then go out forever. No; she lives and shines in celestial splendor in the presence of him who loves little children, "and gathers them like lambs to his fold."

SHARPE.—MRS. CATHARINE A. SHARPE, nee Sledge, was born near La Grange, Ala., on November 26, 1820, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus at home in Demopolis, Ala., on February 27, 1882. When about fourteen years of age she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which communion she lived a consistent Christian life and died a peaceful, happy death. On November 13, 1851, she was married to Mr. O. Y. Sharpe, of Demopolis, who with seven children is left to mourn her loss. For several years previous to her death Sister Sharpe was confined to her home by a sickness that eventuated in her death. During these years of suffering and confinement an opportunity was given for the development of those virtues—patience, meekness and gentleness—which so beautify and adorn the Christian character; and which in my intercourse with her were abundantly manifest. My acquaintance with Sister Sharpe extended through a period of about fourteen months, during which time I frequently visited her. She always seemed cheerful, and whenever I talked with her concerning her present spiritual condition and her future prospect, she always assured me of her trust in God, her Saviour, and her "patient waiting for his coming." Sometimes when we would sing with her, as her strength would allow she would join with us with great delight. Though not with her in the dying hour I am told she "witnessed a good confession." Sister Sharpe was a patient sufferer, a loving wife, a devoted mother and a consistent Christian. The last time I saw her was on the occasion of our second quarterly meeting, when with my presiding elder I visited her, and he administered to her the holy sacrament. As I bade her good-bye, and looked into her pale face upon which a pleasant smile rested, I thought she could repeat the sweet lines of Homar:

"Beyond the parting and the meeting."

Her pastor, J. P. HAMILTON.

CAVIN.—MOSES CAVIN was born in Jackson county, Tenn., March 13, 1814, and died February 2, 1882. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of eighteen. He was married first to Sarah Shropshire, April 5, 1842; the second time to Mrs. Diana F. Flinn, November 14, 1871.

For fifty years Bro. Cavin was a faithful member of the church, holding official position a great part of the time. Struggling from poverty up to competency and independence in worldly goods, he preserved, through all trials and vicissitudes, his Christian integrity, and was always known as a spiritually-minded Christian. He was a lively stone in the temple of the Lord. The many itinerants who have gone in and out before him will remember him as a cordial supporter and friend of the cause of God. Toward the close of his useful life he was beset with many cares, yet he was always found, when able, in his place in the house of God. His hands, though always full of business, never forgot the interests of Zion. He was always ready to talk on religious interests. He was stricken down quite suddenly. Though the enemy approached unawares, I doubt not he was found ready. He leaves a widow, three sons and two daughters. They will miss much his prudent counsels and fatherly attentions. May the God of their husband and father be the comforter.

MCCURDY.—ROBERT A. L. MCCURDY was born in North Carolina, January 8, 1812, and was killed by a fall from a wagon, near Springville, La., on the second day of February, 1882. For many years Bro. McCurdy has been a resident of Springfield, where he successfully carried on a gin-shop; putting up a gin that has no superior in that line. How long, Bro. McCurdy has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, none of us know; but as long as he has been known, no truer or better man could be found. Religion with him was a principle acted out in all the phases of life, regular and consistent, devoted and watchful.

Many years ago he erected a family altar, and until the day of his sudden death, morning and night God was worshiped by reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer. In the church he had held important stations, which he always filled with a zeal that won for him the highest esteem of his brethren. Intelligent, affectionate, a true friend, good citizen, devoted husband, kind father, and humble follower of Jesus, his summons was without warning; but long since he had heeded the advice of the Savior: "Be ye also ready." He leaves a wife and five children to weep; but not as others who have no hope.

J. W. BEARS.

LEWIS.—MISS K. A. LEWIS was born August 21, 1863, and died December 31, 1881. She joined the church, at Crystal Springs, in October, 1875, and was converted September 20, 1881, under a sermon preached by the writer at China Grove Camp Meeting. She was buried Sunday, January 1, 1882. How sad that on the first day of the pastor's entrance into his new work he should be called upon to lay away one so young and promising, and so recently converted under his ministry. But the evidence of her acceptance in Jesus was clear, and she is at rest in heaven. She was a true and loving daughter and sister, and the home circle is desolate without her. None miss her so much as mother, brothers and sisters; but "why weep, the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth." She was a devoted member of the Sunday-school and church, and we will miss her there, for she was a regular attendant, and always ready to do what she could for the cause of Jesus. All who knew her loved her for her kind and genial disposition. May Jesus comfort the bereaved ones.

W. W. HOPPER.

CRISLER.—BRO. GEORGE CRISLER was born in the State of Georgia, September 19, 1812, and died, at his home near Oak Ridge, La., January 16, 1882. Bro. Crisler joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in early life, and lived a consistent member in it until he was taken from the church militant into the church triumphant. He suffered some time before his death, but amidst all his sufferings he was patient, accepting all as for good, and believed that all was working together for good since he loved God. I visited him during the last days of his life, and found him submissive to the will of the divine Master. He expressed himself as full of faith and hope, willing to go at God's bidding. His life tells of his future. He leaves a wife and many friends to mourn his death, but they mourn not as those who have no hope. May his death be sanctified to their eternal good.

T. S. H.

FESSELL.—On September 27, 1881, the dark monster, death, entered the home of Bro. Monroe and Sister Laura Fessell, and claimed as his prey little MURRAY NELSON. But, lo! the angel of God was there to release the cherub spirit and bear it out on bright pinions to the blissful abode of the saved, there to live above suffering and death forever. Murray was five years, eight months and one day old. He was a healthy, manly-looking, fine-humored little fellow. The delight of his ambition was to preach the gospel. Hence he often expressed the desire. He may yet fly with the archangel in heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and people.

LEDYARD.—Tribute of the Wesleyans of Shubuta, Miss., to Mrs. Ledyard, their deceased President.

Whereas, It has pleased the Supreme Ruler of the Universe to remove from earth our beloved and faithful President, Mrs. CARRIE H. LEDYARD, and, whereas, by her death not we only, but the entire community, are bereaved, therefore, as a tribute of respect to her memory and as a token of our love,

Resolved, That while we question not the wisdom of His doings, but bow with humble prayer for resignation to the mysterious workings of his providence, we feel that the Wesleyan Society has sustained a loss that is irreparable. As our chosen head, for three years we have proved her wise in counsel, zealous in good works, and in all things faithful to her trust.

Resolved, That we commend her as a shining light to the members of the Society, and exhort them while they fondly cherish her memory, to emulate her example. Let the memory of her heart and life, attuned to God's service like "perfect music unto noble words," be ever a beacon light to guide us along the shore of time, that we, like her, may die the death of the righteous.

Resolved, That to her bereaved husband and relatives we tender our deepest sympathy and our earnest prayers. To them we say: Your loss is ours, yet we sorrow not as those without hope—these dispensations of Providence are but links in the chain that binds us to heaven.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Society, as a lasting memorial of the esteem in which we held her, not only as a faithful worker in our Master's cause, but as a Christian and a friend beloved. Also, that we send copies of the same to the Messenger and to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication, and order a copy to the family of our departed sister, with the hope that the Comforter will be also unto them as a heavenly benediction.

Respectfully submitted, MRS. C. A. STEVALL,
For Committee.

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

My Dear Young Friends of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South: I write again to tell you more of this great empire and her people.

China is the largest and the oldest country under one form of government. Their authentic history dates back nearly four thousand years. The origin of the Chinese, as far as we know, seems to be as follows:

During the first century after the confusion of tongues, five or six nomadic tribes from the region southeast of the Caspian Sea made their way eastward by successive stages, seeking out the best watered and most productive places, and finally settled on the banks of the Yellow river in the north, and in the basin of the great Yang-tze-kiang, in the central and western portions of which is now the empire. The tribe which constituted the original progenitors of the Chinese race, chiefly by their superior skill in agriculture, their settled habits of labor, and by obtaining all the low, rich lands along the water courses, which the renowned emperor "Zu" drained and protected the country from inundation, became much more prosperous than their neighbors, and gradually by conquests, alliances and inter-marriages, they absorbed all the tribes around them except the Miantsz, or aborigines of China, who, to this day, exist among the mountains in the west and south of China as a distinct race and enemies of the Chinese.

A little more than one thousand years before the Christian era, the Chinese were confined to within very narrow limits in Shensi and Shantung provinces, measuring from north to south 250 miles, and from east to west 1300 miles. They were closely hemmed in on all sides by hostile barbarians. These barbarous nations were sometimes mixed up with the more cultivated and ruling races as servants; and at times as disagreeable neighbors. All these races were without letters; base and degraded, who held no communication with superior States, except the Tsinites on the west, whose ballads have a place in the "Book of Poetry" to this day. This exception has, no doubt, an important bearing on the question of the origin of Chinese civilization; for the Tsinites must have occupied the borders of Thibet before the Chinese displaced the Chowites from the province of Shensi.

Chinese history states that the first man on earth, after the separation of heaven and earth, was called Pankoo, and was assisted by a woman named Chow-wah. Some writers describe Pankoo as a man wearing an apron of leaves; but they can give no account of how he was created. They say that he was the original ruler of the world. Some say he was an extraordinary personage whose origin is unknown. The Chinese recognize heaven, earth and man as the three great powers by which all inferior things were produced.

The first dynasty embraced a period of eighteen thousand years, during which time twelve brothers reigned. The second dynasty continued the same length of time, during which period eleven brothers reigned. The third dynasty extended through a space of forty-five thousand years, during which time nine brothers reigned. This is the fabulous period. A native historian, speaking of this early period, says: "I am of opinion that Pankoo did not long precede Fuhhi, perhaps a thousand years, certainly not ten thousand years; and that he was succeeded by Zoon and Shun, probably about a century, certainly not a thousand years. Fuhhi taught the people pastoral employments, taught music, and enforced the duty of marriage. He taught the people how to offer sacrifice;" but for what purpose it does not say. This brings us down to the time of the flood. According to the Chinese system of chronology, it happened in the year of the world 1753, which is only fifty-seven years later than the generally received date of the deluge given by Moses in Genesis.

You know the Bible speaks of Noah and his three sons, and how God saved them and their families during the flood. Noah had one son called Shem who was the ancestor of the Chinese. They were not called Chinese then, but Shemites; for they are his descendants. Just after the confusion of tongues, the children of Shem separated from the rest of mankind and traveled eastward. They settled down to cultivate the soil, for they were a peaceable people. That was directly after the division of the earth by Peleg, about 101 years after the flood. Noah was then living and was no doubt present, and also his sons Shem, Ham and Japhet, when the division was made; for Noah lived 250 years after the flood. In the early history of the Chinese they speak of themselves as a nomadic race, dwelling in booths made from the branches of trees and covered with leaves or tall reeds. They speak of two great chiefs, Zoon and Shun, who were their leaders. To this day they extol them in the highest terms for their virtues, and teach their children that they should imitate their example. The first great chief was undoubtedly Noah, and the second great chief, Shun, was Shem, the son of Noah. We have no doubt but that this is distinct tradition refers to the great and good man Noah and his son Shem. Noah preached repentance for 120 years before the flood, while building the ark, and I have no doubt he continued to preach after the flood until his death. He was no doubt aware of the building of the Tower of Babel, and when the earth was divided, there is no doubt but that he was present and gave his counsel. The children of Shem would not soon forget the preaching of their grandfather Zoon (Noah) and of the good example of Shem, their father.

The great "Zu" was the first Emperor of China at the beginning of the dynasty. He is represented as living in the time of a great flood, and was eight years engaged in draining the lower lands of China. This tradition and history of the Chinese may have a direct reference to the time of the flood mentioned in Genesis, and we safely challenge any one to give us a better account of the tradition.

The father of "Zu" was employed by Zoon (Noah) for nine years to drain all the lower lands, and not being able to accomplish his task was slain. "Zu," his son, was employed in this work for eight years and was successful. In his report to Zoon (Noah), he said: "The deluge rose high and spread wide as the spacious vault of heaven, buried the hills and covered the mountains with its waters, into which the common people, astonished to stupefaction, sank." Before the death of Zoon, he handed over the government of the people to Shun, and at once he (Shun) began the study of astronomy. "In the twenty-eighth year of Shun's reign Zoon died, as a leaf falls from the tree and fades away."

"Shun spent thirty years of his life in private; thirty in an official station; sat upon the throne fifty; and died at the age of one hundred and ten years."

If, according to Chinese history, these chieftains lived, it must have been in the early history of the world directly after the flood. Everything in their history bears marks of originality, as though old things began with them. They seem to have kept themselves aloof from others and rather looked down upon them as barbarians. This seems to have been their character from the beginning to the present time. They seem to think heaven is particularly interested in them as a nation, and, therefore, they call their emperor, "heaven's son." The emperor is said to reign by authority of heaven, and this has been so for nearly four thousand years. The sentiments and conduct of those great men, those ancient chieftains, have been revered in all subsequent ages as models of virtuous government and practice. The tradition of the deluge, so nearly like that of Moses in description and chronology, should confirm our faith in the Bible account of it. Some have attempted to prove the account of the flood in the Shoo-king was only local and referred to the overflow of some river. But there is much to prove that the account refers to the deluge spoken of in the Bible.

I will write again, in a short time, on the subject of the antiquity of China.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, Jan. 31, 1882.

Among Old Letters.

Bishop Andrew preserved many of his letters. He was a fine letter-writer himself, and had an extensive correspondence. These are now in my hand, and as I have examined them, one after another, what a group of the good men of other days have gathered about me!

Here is Stephen Olin. He is a young man when this his first dingy-yellow, but beautifully-written letter, comes to Rev. James O. Andrew, Charleston, S. C. He had gone to Charleston on his first pastorate, and had stirred the whole city with his eloquence, and now, broken in health, he flies to Vermont. He writes somewhat hopefully—always frustingly—and sends his love to Brother Howard, and especially to "the dear wife and little Elizabeth." And here is another, twenty-one years afterward, from the same hand; evidently time and care have made their deep impress; for he has buried his Georgia wife as his old friend has buried his Amelia; but now he comes with a long four pages, addressed to Bishop James O. Andrew, Oxford, and beginning Rev. and Dear Sir. It was after 1841—the September after. How full it was of assurances of affection, unchanged and unchangeable, and of a confidence never shaken. What the reply to it was I cannot find; I only know that all the letters thereafter had the old-time ring of 1821. And here, with steady, measured, stroke are the letters of Joshua Soule. I can almost see the old Roman as he towers in the General Conference of 1820; or the General Conference of 1844. His letters are carefully written; every word distinct, orthography perfect, full of sagacity and repose; and here comes before me the classic face of Ignatius Few, a Georgian born, educated at Princeton, a lawyer and a skeptic, then a Methodist preacher, a College President, to the last a Christian philosopher. On this great folio sheet, with what neat chirography, he presents his views to the dear Bishop who is to preside at the Conference of 1840, of education, of Emory College, and the Georgia Female College, not yet the Wesleyan; and then sadly asks permission to give up the work he has done so well, and go into that quiet retirement from which he came no more.

These letters from the dear old Judge absolutely smile on me. Do letters ever look to you like the men who wrote them? In a hand as small as a lady's, full to the very brim of bursting merriment, natural as nature, these letters to the dear friend of all the years since twenty-seven when he left his sick-bed at the grave of his little boy, and found peace with God at the Methodist altar. This same Bishop now was his pastor in those early years, and now he is a neighbor, and his friend. With his dear wife he has come down to spend the day at Chestnut Grove with Amelia and the children, and while they, the good women, are seeing about dinner, he will write to his good brother at the General Conference in Baltimore. He will, the honest Hemgerat, slyly dig into the ribs of the sturdy Whig, the Bishop, about the demonogonery of cone-skins, and hard cider, and log-cabins; but after dinner, when he has cherry pie and strawberry pie, in jolly good humor, he will close his letter.

And here is W. M. Wightman. How classic the face, how fastidious the dress, how elegant the manners, and how he differs in every feature from "his dear and honored Bishop;" but how he loved him, and how the Bishop delights in his boy's success. There is a joyous spring-time melody in the letters of these early days. Here is one written just before he goes to his University, of which he had such hopes. It is in answer to one from the old Bishop, telling him of the old days when he took young William Wightman, the painter's son, around the district in his gig, and all the heart of the great-hearted man breaks out in a responding letter.

Here are two letters from Wm. Capers. They are both on foolscap, folded as the old-time letters were; the one to tell the sad story of how, for the first time since 1808, he had been forced to turn his back on his work, and go home; he could not make the trip to Texas; and the other to weep with his friend of over forty years at the grave of his buried Leonora.

Then here are so many, written in such faultless style, from one who is living still now in his home in Aberdeen; so wise, so tender, so full of faith and love.

And here a few from "Old Virginny." You can see his gray head, and great eye-brows, and straight-breasted coat, and courtly ways in every line he writes; and side by side with him I see the sweet face, all bubbling over with mischief, and yet full of dignity and grace—strange it should be hidden from us so soon—the face of Jimmy Duncan. What child-like letters, how reverential, how affectionate. The first when he was a circuit rider on the border away up in Northwestern Virginia, where the border warfare was raging; and the last from the President's seat of Randolph-Macon, telling of how he would not take the place till God told him to do so, and of how he was striving to do God's work in it. This came not very long before the day the good Bishop went away.

These are some few of the letters. It has been my good lot in life to know most of the men who wrote them, and those I have not known my family know as well that they were like old friends to me. My mother used to sit on Stephen Olin's knee; my father used to watch beside the sick-bed of Ignatius Few; the rest I knew and loved. They are all gone but one, and he stands on the water's edge with the boat-anchor lifted and the sail spread. He, too, will soon be out of sight.

I can't get the answers to these letters. Did no one preserve his letters? He kept every scrap from chosen friends, but I have written and written and cannot get his. I have many from him; and Thomas Arnold and Samuel Rutherford and Thomas Chalmers have not written letters which will be read with a deeper interest; but where are the many he did write?—Geo. G. Smith, in Nashville Christian Advocate.

Religious Intelligence.

MISSIONARY.

—Letters from the missionaries of the Church Society in Uganda, Central Africa, contain the welcome intelligence that they are now free to teach and preach in Mtesa's kingdom. The bath of letters previously received contained no later date than April 10. The present correspondence begins with April 24 and closes with August 1. Under date of April 21 the Rev. P. O'Flaherty wrote that he had been speaking to the king about religion, contrasting Christianity with Mohammedanism, and that no Arabs were allowed in court. He was teaching many of the people, some of whom could read a little already, and young men came also to Mr. Mackay for instruction. He had an opportunity of speaking to one of the great imbari chiefs, and had led him to express a desire to learn to read. In his next letter, dated May 27, he states that Mr. Mackay is building a large house, which will be the glory of Uganda, a marvel to the natives. He also says that some of the Arabs had been severely beaten by employes at the palace, and one old tyrant was obliged to leave, with his slaves. On invitation, Mr. O'Flaherty spoke boldly before Mtesa against Moslemism and since then Mtesa hoists his flag on Sundays. In regard to the mean tricks of the French priests and their efforts to undermine the influence of the missionaries, Mr. O'Flaherty says he told them that unless they ceased their misrepresentations he would make counter attacks on them. Since then the priests have become very friendly and frequently dine with the missionaries. The superior, he writes, he is "fond of. He is a scholar, a gentleman, and a pious man. He and I have frequent talks together. I bring before him the fundamental doctrines of a true-hearted Christianity. He and his brethren are astonished at the doctrines of pure Protestantism. They were taught to believe them something else." On June 23 he writes of the gardening operations, saying in a year or two they could draw their support from the soil. Two days later he speaks of receiving a message from the king, to the effect that he would send him a class of twelve boys, with their fathers, who are carpenters and smiths, to be trained. July 1 he asks for reinforcements. Both himself and Mr. Mackay have more than they can do and need at least three men to help them. The people are coming to them in crowds, asking for instruction. In his last letter, dated August 1, Mr. O'Flaherty speaks of the arrival of another lot of fanatical Arabs. He thinks the king's eyes have been opened as to the Koran, and that he would like, if he could, to abolish the slave trade in his dominions. As to the climate, both Mr. O'Flaherty and Mr. Mackay speak well of it. The latter says: "I have as yet seen no reason to believe that this country has an unhealthy climate. I believe it is far healthier than anywhere on the coast of Zanzibar and much less enervating." One can sow, he says, and reap any day in any month. The rains are copious, but not nearly so heavy as on the west shore of the lake, in Buzongora. He verifies Dr. Livingstone's observations to the effect that the moister the climate the blacker the skin of the natives. The Bazongora and the Banyamlio in the rainy districts around the lake are as black as a coal, while the tribes from the comparatively dry hills of Busoga and Gamfaragara are not much darker than the Arabs.—New York Independent.

—MATTERS AT AINTAB.—A correspondent writes: Aintab is situated one hundred miles from the northeast corner of the Mediterranean sea, and is three thousand two hundred feet above its surface. The height of Aintab moderates the climate, which would otherwise be quite unbearable in summer. In the winter sometimes we have bright summer-like days, and in some seasons no snow falls; but some years a large quantity falls. Just now the ground has been covered with snow for four days and it is cold; the thermometer stands at eighteen deg. Fahrenheit. The country is a rolling rocky country, only the valleys were the fields can be irrigated being cultivated. Two-thirds of the surface under cultivation is given up to vineyards, so that they are, after the bare white rock of the hill-tops, the most marked feature of the landscape. Grapes form a large part of the food of the people. They make large quantities of grape sugar, which is used in the winter as a common article of food, and of which large quantities are exported. Manufactured raisins are also made and exported. Wine, though, is but little used and not exported at all.

It is now more than thirty years since the first missionaries came here; they were at first driven away with violence and in some instances stoned, but they returned, and long before this time the people of all classes have learned that the missionary is their best friend, and treat him accordingly. It has been the plan and practice of the missionaries to form the converts gathered into independent self-governing churches, and the result has been just what was looked for. In the large places, and some of the smaller towns, there are strong, self-supporting churches, and in many other places where the church still receives aid would still live and grow if all help were withdrawn, though they might be forced to get on without a pastor for a long time. Another proof of the deep root taken by the reformation in the hearts of the people of this country is the interest they show in education. For instance, they have established here in Aintab a college in which are gathered young men from all parts of the country where Turkish is the spoken language. True, the efforts of the Christians of this region were supplemented by friends in America and Great Britain, but it was the native Evangelical Union of the churches of Cilicia that inaugurated the movement, and made it their own both by the enthusiastic way they have interested themselves and by their gifts. The college stands on high ground outside the city, overlooking on the north the plain of Aintab, with its vineyards and wheat fields, and on the south the high rocky hills with here and there between them in the valleys a vineyard. The college has at present eighty-five students, of whom twelve are in the medical department. The number seems small, but the country is still suffering from the results of famine and of the war with Russia, and we look for a steady increase.—Christian Union.

—"Tell our friends that there is on the east African coast a lonely grave of a member of the mission cause connected with your society. This is a sign that you have commenced the struggle with this part of the world; and as victories of the church are gained by stepping over the graves of many of her members, you may be the more convinced that the hour is at hand when you are summoned to the conversion of Africa from its eastern shore." Thus wrote Dr. Krapf, who recently died; when he laid away the body of his heroic wife, and by her side their new-born babe. He had lain helpless with fever by her side when she was dying. May the kind Father in heaven have mercy on all of us who magnify our petty contributions and mock self-denials into virtues. Krapf's story and that of his wife, shames into oblivion a million such petty exercises for the world's redemption. It is a good spiritual tonic to read Krapf's story.—Northern Christian Advocate.

—The Philadelphia Methodist says: "The Woman's Medical College of that city, under the direction of Miss R. L. Bodley, M. D., is doing an excellent work in the way of giving a medical education to ladies about to go into the foreign mission work. Out of the one hundred and ten matriculants of the present term, nine are looking to, or are already under appointment for missionary work. One of these, Mrs. Dr. Thoburn, is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; three of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; three of the Baptist Church, North; one of the Baptist Church, South; one of the Presbyterian Church; and one, of the "Society of Friends." Besides these there are five in the class daughters of missionaries and born in heathen lands—one in the Sandwich Islands, one in India, two in Burmah, and one in Palestine.

—The Rev. Dr. Happer, of Canton, one of the oldest of our missionaries in China, has published a paper on the population of that country. He finds that it has been greatly overestimated. Canon George Rawlinson has made it as low as 100,000,000. Dr. S. Wells Williams does not place it higher than 340,000,000. Dr. Happer gives good reasons for believing that the population of China has, by wars and famine, been reduced in sixty years by 60,000,000, and that at the present time the whole population does not exceed 300,000,000.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The mission started by the Mennonites last summer among the Arapahoes in the Indian Territory has met with a severe loss in the burning of their new building, caused by a defective flue. The fire caught during a terrible storm of wind and sleet, technically known as a "Norther," and started in a part of the house where four small children were sleeping, the rest of the household, teachers and pupils, being on the opposite side, engaged in their usual Sunday-evening devotions. The flames spread with such fury that before the children could be reached two of them had already died of suffocation and the other two did not survive the next day. One, an infant, nine months old, was the child of the missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Haury. The other three were Indians. The building was large enough to accommodate fifty-five pupils and a boarding-school had been successfully started. The pecuniary loss, which was complete, is estimated at $7,000, but the loss of life entirely overshadows it. In reporting his work, last August, Mr. Haury said: "We shall have four or five workers employed in our school, every one of whom is expected to be a Christian and to lead a Christian, moral life—in short, to be a Christian missionary in daily life, however mean the particular work may seem." A school conducted on this principle could not have failed to do much toward the uplifting of the Arapahoes. Whether or not this will lead the Mennonites to abandon the mission is not yet known.—New York Independent.

—Sell's Faith of Islam is one of the latest and best works on the subject. "Of all the divine books," says this eminent Mussulman authority, "the Koran is the only one of which the text, words and phrases have been communicated to a prophet by an audible voice. It is otherwise with the Pentateuch, the gospel and other divine books; the prophets received them in the form of ideas." "This," adds Mr. Sell, "expresses the universal belief on this point, a belief which reveals the essentially mechanical nature of Islam." The Koran thus claims to be a divine revelation in a sense different from all other sacred books. It is the belief of every Mohammedan, that not only the thoughts and ideas are of divine origin, but the very words and their arrangement were communicated to the prophet as they were coined and composed in the mint of heaven."

—The London "Spectator" thus states the position of the great majority of the Bishops of the convocation of Canterbury on the question of ritualism: "The Ritualists are not to be held worthy of even the smallest toleration. The Bishops do not wish to alter the law; on the contrary, they wish to see the law carried out in the most stringent way as possible. All their anxiety is that it should be enforced quietly and effectively, not as at present, noisily and ineffectively. They are annoyed by the sight of Mr. Green imprisoned, but they would not be in the least annoyed by the sight of Mr. Green deprived. That they would recognize as a satisfactory and well-merited penalty—a penalty neither unnecessary for the vindication of the law, nor in excess of the latest legislation on the subject of ritual uniformity."

—One of Bishop Seymour's clergy speaks of the diocese of Springfield as "the happy hunting-grounds of Catholics, a sort of Ritualistic Mecca."

—The bill reported by the Spiritual committee on ecclesiastical laws rejects almost the whole measure in the form proposed by the Government.

Our Young People.

UNCLE BEN.

He worked in his line for a dollar a day;
Forty and late his anvil rang;
The children often paused in their play,
When his strong arm the hammer swung
To the end of his three score years and ten,
He was known in the village as Uncle Ben.

He never murmured, whatever his task,
His heart was light as a bird's in June;
"God gives to me always more than I ask,"
He often hummed in a comforting tune,
When men who were thought to be stronger than he
Were tossed to and fro, like a wreck on the sea.

'Twas good as a feast to hear him declare,
"By the sweat of my brow I earn my bread,
I have plenty to eat, and something to spare,
And no mortgage covers the ground where I tread,"
And lustily still his hammer would swing,
And music again from his anvil ring.

"'Tis true that my clothes are not very fine,
My best Sunday coat has lasted for years,
But why should a mortal like me repine?
God always is better to me than my fears;"
And the fire of his forge had a ruddier glow,
As he gave to his iron its finishing blow.

Great teacher of goodness, contentment and trust!
But few have I honored more truly than thee;
The path that did lead was the path of the just,
And brighter, still brighter, it seems to me now,
As I turn from the mirth, and the mazes of men,
To muse on thy virtues, dear old Uncle Ben.

Let Us All Try.

DEAR LITTLE COUSINS: While reading the ADVOCATE in my room this evening, my eye fell with interest, as it always does, on the children's column. It was to me however, more interesting than usual, containing as it did that sweet letter from Miss "Emma." We see that she at least has not forgotten the noble enterprise of little Annie and Olive, and appeals to us to aid them in carrying out their undertaking. Although we have been rather tardy in seconding their endeavors, the good old saying—"Better late than never"—is, and will ever remain in vogue, and there is still time for us to "be up and doing." Think how many little folks there are in the three States who weekly read the ADVOCATE, and how much good they could do if they would all contribute something? True, it may be but little, but little from a great many grows "big." Situated as I am at present, I can see no means of earning anything immediately. "Where there is a will there is a way," however, is one of the first maxims I remember to have learned, and as I certainly have the will, I know the way will be provided. Although I can not with Miss "Emma," be styled among the little folks, I wish to be regarded as one of the young ones. Let us all then, dear little Cousin, try to do something, be that something ever so small.

Affectionately, LOTTA.

ALA., March 12.

EDITOR. Yes, let us all try, and we shall succeed.

From Morton, Miss.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: As I haven't seen any letters in the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE in some time, I have concluded to write a short letter to be published in the young folks column. I am going to school and am studying dictionary, grammar, arithmetic, history, composition, French and Latin. I think I have my hands full. Our teachers are Mrs. Thompson (our worthy pastor's wife) and Mrs. Cooper. I like them very much. I have four little brothers and one little sister—but she is in Heaven. We have Bro. H. F. Thompson to preach for us again this year, and we all like him. A Sunday-school was organized last Sunday. I was of course glad, for we haven't had a Sunday-school in sometime. Well I will say good bye.

PETRUS SHORE.

March 11, 1882.

A Pet Flying Squirrel.

Once when he was sick, she sat up all night with him; and wherever she journeyed she took him with her in a small traveling contrivance something like a tin pail, pierced with many openings for air, and having a cover which shut him in securely. On one occasion he watched his chance and slipped out while they were waiting for a train in the large room at a depot, and darted across the feet of a lady, who shrieked out, "A mouse! a mouse? No, 'tisn't a mouse! oh, it's a cat! No, 'tisn't a rat! oh, what is it? What-a-t-is it?"

When she found from her neighbor's exclamation that it was "my dear little flying squirrel, and I'm afraid I shall lose him," she laid down her handle and bags, gathered up her skirts, and started to help catch him. But it was not so easy. The next woman, and then the other one, joined in the pursuit; and then the man who came in with the coal; and then the ticket-master; and then a boy who was hanging about. It was almost train-time, when all the doors would be set open, and a crowd of passengers inward bound would come pouring in.

The people who were engaged in the chase understood the gravity of the situation, and each and all redoubled their energy. The owner, the three other women, the man of the coal, the ticket-master and the boy went around and around that room; they jumped up on the seats, and they jumped down again; they flapped their hats and struck blindly with their handkerchiefs; they poked and punched with umbrellas; they stumbled and reeled, and were themselves out. The naughty squirrel would whisk himself against their faces, and sail along obligingly near them, almost within reach, and when they felt sure of him, he was gone. But at the last moment, when the engine was pulling in front of the door, he came down of his own accord, just as if he knew all about it, slipped into his cage, and cuddled down, with an arch expression in his big lustrous eyes which seemed to say that he wondered if he was going to have the whip-plug, he knew he deserved.—Wide Awake.

HOW ANIMALS PLAY.—Small birds chase each other about in play; but perhaps the conduct of the crane and the trumpeter is most extraordinary. The latter stands on one leg, hops around in the most eccentric manner, and throws somersaults. The Americans call it the mad bird, on account of these singularities. Water birds, such as ducks and geese, dive after each other, and clear the surface of the water with outstretched neck, and flapping wings, throwing abundant spray around. Deer often engage in sham battle, or trial of strength, by twisting their horns together and pushing for the mastery. All animals pretending violence in their play stop short of exercising it; the dog takes the greatest precaution not to injure by his bite; and the orang-outang, in wrestling with his keeper, pretends to throw him, and makes feints of biting him. Some animals carry out in their play the semblance of catching their prey. Young cats, for instance, leap after every small and moving object, even to the leaves strewed by the autumn wind. They crouch and steal forward ready for the spring, the body quivering and the tail vibrating with emotion; they tumble on the moving leaf, and again spring forward to another. Bunger saw young cougars and jaguars playing with round animals, like kittens. Birds of the magpie kind are the analogues of monkeys, full of mischief, play and mimicry. There is a story of a tame magpie that was seen busily employed in a garden gathering pebbles with much solemnity and studied air, burying them in a hole made to receive a post. After dropping each stone it cried "Chr-ack!" triumphantly, and set off for another. On examining the spot, a poor toad was found in the hole, which the magpie was stoning for his amusement.

THE EXACT TRUTH.—Two young masons were building a brick wall—the front wall of a high house. One of them, in placing a brick, discovered that it was a little thicker on one side than the other.

"It will make your wall untrue, Ben," he said.

"Pooh!" answered Ben; "what difference will such a trifle as that make? You're too particular."

"My mother," replied he, "taught me that truth is truth, and ever so little an untruth is a lie, and a lie is no trifle."

"Oh," said Ben, "that's all very well; but I'm not lying, and have no intention of lying."

"Very true, but you make your wall tell a lie, and I have read that a lie in one's work is like a lie in his character. It will show itself sooner or later, and bring harm, if not ruin."

"I'll risk it in this case," answered Ben, and he worked away, laying more brick, carrying the wall up higher, till the close of the day, when they quit work and went home.

The next morning they went to resume their work, when, behold, the lie had wrought out the result of all lies. The wall, getting a little slant from the untrue brick, had got more and more untrue as it got higher, and at last, in the night, had toppled over again.

Just so with ever so little an untruth in your character; it grows more and more untrue if you permit it to remain, till it brings sorrow and ruin.

Tell, act, and live the exact truth always.

THE DIFFERENCE IN TIME.—For some of our little readers, who may be travelers, we quote the following: "Let us suppose that it is noon on Monday, and that we are in the Pacific ocean. At a point fifteen degrees further west, it is eleven o'clock; at Sydney, fifteen degrees further, it is ten o'clock; at a point in Central Australia, it is nine; at Nanking, it is eight; at a point in Central Siam, it is seven; at Calcutta, it is six, and the sun there is just rising. For every fifteen degrees there is about one hour's difference in time. When it is six o'clock at Calcutta, it is five, fifteen degrees further west, at Lahore; at Bagdad, it is four; at the line of the Ural mountains, it is three; at St. Petersburg, two; at Naples, one; and at Greenwich, England, it is midnight, Sunday night. In the middle of the Atlantic, it is ten o'clock Sunday night; at Philadelphia, eight o'clock; and at St. Louis, six o'clock, or about sunset. And so, keeping on around the globe to the same point in the Pacific ocean, where we supposed it was noon on Monday, we find that it is noon on Sunday. Now, on the east side of the meridian, in the Pacific, the day is Sunday, but west of that point it is Monday. In making calculations of time, the circuit of the globe is obtained in that way."

A STORY OF A PAIR OF DRUM-STICKS.—After the battle of Saratoga, in 1777, a pair of drum-sticks were found by the side of a British drummer, who had been killed. The sticks were given to an American drummer-boy who used them during the remainder of the Revolutionary War.

The boy became a man, and when the war of 1812 began he gave the Saratoga sticks to his son. The latter used them throughout the war of 1812, and they beat the "Americans to Arms," at the battle of New Orleans, in 1815. A grandson of the Revolutionary drummer used the same sticks in Gen. Scott's army during the Mexican War.

A great-grandson of the Revolutionary drummer carried them for four years during the late civil war, and now they are in the possession of Col. Morrow, of Niles, Michigan.

The historical sticks were used at a re-union of Michigan soldiers at Buchanan, in that State, August 25. One of the sticks is made of cam-wood and the other of mahogany. They are both sound, though they are more than one hundred years old.

The maelstrom, off the coast of Norway, is simply a current between two islands. Its swiftness depends almost entirely upon the state of the wind and tide. There is at no time a vortex, and the fishermen actually drop their nets in the centre of the channel. There is, however, some danger of a ship being driven upon the rocks when the wind blows strongly from the northwest and meets the tide with the immense body of water which is forced into the narrow channel, so much more shallow than the sea outside the islands to the west. There are many like currents among the Lofodens, and all are caused by similar pressure of outside sea upon straitened and shallow channels. Though ships are seldom if ever driven aground, whales frequently are. The contracted entrances, which are quite deep outside, suddenly shoal within, and the whale, having inadvertently entered, it is impossible for him to retreat, owing to the large space required for turning his unwieldly body, and so with the falling tide he is generally stranded and thus becomes an easy prey.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1882.

The death of the poet Longfellow will touch a chord of sorrow in thousands of hearts in every civilized country. Especially, wherever the English language is used, and its literature is read, will the announcement be heard with sadness. After the death of Bryant, and perhaps before, he stood at the head of the writers of American verse. It is certain that he leaves no peer behind him in this department of our literature. The author of "The Voices of the Night," "Evangeline," "Hiawatha," and the translation of "Dante's Divina Commedia," leaves the rythm and melody of his numbers vibrating in the thought and feeling of the age. His works are as pure as the snow upon his native hills, and as fragrant, and as delicately tinted, as the apple blossoms of a New England orchard.

The only American poet with whom we can compare him is Bryant. Both were artists, both were inspired with true genius, and both were poets of nature; but Longfellow wrote more extended poems than his great cotemporary, and his position in the world of letters is probably higher. Longfellow never wrote a line that, in dying, he could wish to be suppressed. His was a pure mind and a good heart, and there is not an unclean line in all his works. It is gratifying to reflect that these, our two greatest American poets, were deeply imbued with reverence for religion, that their lives were pure, and that their works can exert only a wholesome and elevating influence upon the minds of our youth.

Under the sombre feelings which the great and good poet's death inspires, we very naturally recall the "Psalm of Life," and those "voices" which sound to us now as the most appropriate requiem which the mourners can sing. He sang of life and of death, and also of immortality:

> Life is real! Life is earnest!
> And the grave is not its goal;
> Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
> Was not spoken of the soul.

The floods, the floods! It is heart-rending to read of the ruin of homes, the impoverishment of the people, the suffering, and the loss of life. It may be that, in such years as this, and under such conjunction of circumstances, it is impossible to confine the great river within bounds.

But one thing is clear, that much of this terrible devastation is owing to the conduct of the people. A timely and liberal expenditure of money, and due vigilance and energy, would have prevented a great deal of this fearful destruction. These high water years must be anticipated, and preparations made to meet them. The cost of closing a single crevasse, expended in time, would have saved entire parishes from damage. A small percentum of the property swept away would have secured the most of the great and rich territory now wasted and bankrupt.

The carelessness of the people in making roads through the levees, in making rice flumes, and in trifling with weak and dangerous places, is amazing. After the flood is upon them new levees are just being finished, and wholly unfit to stand even an ordinary pressure. If the work done, and the money expended, in the crisis of the flood, had been bestowed months ago, millions of property might have been saved. More stringent State laws are needed, co-operation on the part of States and communities, and a waking up to the conviction that it is cheaper to prevent overflows than it is to endure them.

It is far from certain that the United States government will soon take charge of the levees of the Mississippi. The constitutional difficulty is enough for a pretext to refuse this boon; sectional jealousies, and the dangerous increase of Federal patronage which this measure would cause, are also in the way. And yet in the long run it would be cheaper for the government to build the levees than to feed the people during these frequent inundations. So far as the present is concerned, the States and the people immediately involved must prepare to protect themselves. Previous to this great calamity they might have done it; and, after a brief period, it will still be possible. But will it be done?

Failing in assistance from the government, will not the small farmers and planters, and the impoverished people generally, be compelled to sell out to wealthy stock companies and capitalists who are able to own and cultivate large tracts, and make themselves secure? These bottom lands, owned and worked by capitalists, are sufficiently rich and productive to justify such an expenditure as will make them safe from overflow. It is a question of money, and it may have this solution.

Somehow and some time this richest valley in the world, and growing the most valuable staples, will be redeemed from the floods. Nothing adequate has yet been planned or done. It is to-day the most important question—the most vital interest of the Southwest. The improvement of the Mississippi river, and the rescue of its vast alluvion, are matters that demand a most thorough study, and a prompt and vigorous treatment. When this flood goes down will the people and the State governments go on in the old shiftless way?

What is called "the anti-Chinese bill" was passed last week by the House of Representatives, and now awaits the action of the President. By its provisions the Chinese already in the country can stay; but no more can be admitted, as laborers, for twenty years. For other purposes, as travelers, students, traders, merchants, the Chinese can come freely, but not as laborers.

So far as we can learn the bill was passed at the instance of the people on the Pacific coast, and especially to gratify the clamor of white laborers in that section. The Chinese laborers are very apt, and they work very cheap. It is hard for other labor to compete with them, and this other labor demands protection. The trouble is in one locality. There are not more than one hundred thousand Chinese in the United States, but the most of these are in California. Other reasons have been urged for the exclusion of the Chinese, such as the corrupting influence of Chinese morals, their uncleanness, their idolatry, and their entire indifference to the welfare of the country. It is also said that the Chinese are so numerous that, if admitted without let or hindrance, they might become the preponderating element, and overwhelm some regions, and possibly the whole country at length.

A danger of this kind is certainly very remote, and it is doubtful whether the influence of the Chinese upon the morals of our people, even in California, amounts to much. If they were not strong competitors in the labor market, the bill just passed by Congress would never have been entertained, or seriously discussed. Race prejudice has little to do with the matter. That they are heathen and of a different race, and that, for numbers, they are inexhaustible, are circumstances which somewhat enlist popular opinion against them, but the real ground of their exclusion is to favor white labor, and white labor on the Pacific coast.

At present there would seem to be no danger to the country and its institutions from an excessive immigration from the flowery kingdom. If such peril existed the exclusion of the Chinese would be justifiable. On this point we have no doubt. The only question is whether the general welfare of the country demands it at this time. In a certain locality they are objectionable to a certain class of our citizens, but this class is limited, and small in comparison with the entire people. For the sake of Christian missions in China, and for the opportunity of exerting a Christian influence upon the Chinese here, we are disposed to regret this legislation. From this point of view it seems to us to be unfortunate. This is we believe with Senator Jones, of Nevada, a white man's country, and its stability and prosperity, and the maintenance of our Christian civilization, depend upon the predominance of the white race, but we do not think that Mongolian or African can ever gain the ascendency here. Whenever the danger is apparent and pressing it can be met.

Party lines were not observed in the vote on this bill. There were Republicans and Democrats on both sides, the stronger opposition coming, however, from the Republicans, and a greater number of Democrats voting for the measure. But for the Presidential vote of the Pacific States it is evident that the bill would have been lost. As the parties are now nearly evenly divided, neither can well afford to dispense with the votes of those States. At this writing the President has not signified his intentions. He may veto it, and probably will, unless thoughts of the next Presidential election should deter him.

Death of Mrs. Marvin.

The St. Louis Christian Advocate, of March 22, contains the following sad announcement:

Harriet Brotherton Marvin, wife of our late Bishop Marvin, died in Fredricktown, March 16, 1882. This notice has to be made too hurriedly for a proper presentation of the facts of her life, an account of which will be given in our next issue by Dr. W. G. Miller, an old and intimate friend of the family. She died after a few days' illness, in great peace. Her last words were, "The Lord is my Shepherd." Her body was brought to this city on Saturday, Dr. W. G. Miller and Rev. William M. Shelton accompanying the sorrowing daughters. She was buried from St. John's Church, Sunday, two P. M., Dr. T. M. Finney and Rev. William M. Shelton delivering appropriate addresses.

Her body very appropriately rests in Bellefontaine Cemetery, by the side of the husband she loved, and whose life-work she sustained at such sacrifices through so many years.

Mrs. Marvin was a woman whose character and virtues were of the highest order. She was wise, patient, gentle and strong, and every way worthy of the consecrated and noble husband to whose happiness and usefulness she so largely contributed. With him she made sacrifices cheerfully for the cause of Christ. Her presence and example were felt for good wherever she dwelt, and did much to illustrate and commend the gospel which Bishop Marvin preached with such surpassing power and eloquence. She adorned the doctrine of God, her Saviour, in her deep piety, and in every relation of life her womanly excellence shone with a clear and steady light. The Master's commendation of Mary of Bethany, doubtless applies to her: "She hath done what she could." Very fittingly Bishop Marvin, in these words, dedicated his volume of published sermons to her:

> To my wife, Mrs. Harriet Brotherton Marvin, to whose cheerful self-denial and devotion to my work; to whose rigid economy in administering domestic expenditures; to whose ready adjustment of her wants to the exigencies of a meager support, in our earlier life; to whose careful and godly training, of our children, in my protracted absences from home; and to whose example of faith and purity of heart I am more indebted, as a Methodist preacher, than any one except our Maker can know: this volume is affectionately inscribed.

Incidentally, in the Life of Bishop Marvin, by Dr. Finley, the great worth of the itinerant's devoted wife constantly appears. She was both loved and revered by her husband. Referring to her, he says: "When I see the sacrifices she has made for the cause of Christ I regard her more and more as a holy thing." Blended closely in their lives and spirit and work here, the sainted couple are now united in heaven. With unfeigned sorrow the church will hear of the death of Mrs. Marvin. Universally esteemed and loved, her departure will be felt as a bereavement to all. Although taken from us, the impress of her goodness and heroism will remain. A type and representative of our best womanhood, her memory, in freshness and beauty, will long continue among us.

Bad Literature.

The publishing and circulating of bad books, papers and pictures, is one of the greatest evils which afflict society. It is always timely to warn parents and teachers. They must be watchful to guard the young people against this danger.

The tendency of these vicious publications is to destroy all virtue in the young, to unsettle every principle of rectitude, and to unfit them for the practical duties of life. The emissaries and distributors of this unclean literature have their eyes upon the schools and colleges, and their agents are in all the large cities. The young of both sexes are their prey. The profits of the diabolical business depend upon their clandestine patronage. In many homes, where it would not be suspected, some of these vile sheets, books and pictures, are hidden away from the eyes of the parents. And in schools the utmost care is needed on the part of those who have charge of them. These tares of the devil's sowing are being scattered in our religious homes and our Christian schools.

Besides things positively and outrageously obscene, there is a class of papers filled with exciting stories, the tendency of which is to excite young people to wild and criminal courses of life. The illustrations are not so utterly indecent as to subject the publishers to criminal prosecution, and the teaching of vice is the more subtle and dangerous, because indirect, and masked in the garb of pleasing fiction. The amount of this sensational literature sold is said to be enormous. As the salacious pays in theatrical representations, so it is with popular publications. There must be a bordering on the indecent, and a covert approach to the obscene, in order to attract the ignorant and sensual, and to feed the depraved appetite of voluptuaries. There are illustrated papers displayed at some of the shops in New Orleans, around which curious crowds of people gather, and which would not be permitted openly to pass the threshold of any respectable home. Our boys can scarcely walk the streets of any of the large cities without having these pictures flaunted in their faces, and without having their minds corrupted by this dirty trash.

Mr. Anthony Comstock, of New York, working under the auspices of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice," has done much to expose and suppress obscene literature. In a recent address in New York he gives the results of his work in that city and elsewhere during the last ten years. During this period 582 arrests have been made, and 251 persons have been sentenced. The amount of fines imposed reaches the sum of $63,931. In this time Mr. Comstock has seized and destroyed 27,584 pounds of books and printed sheets, and 203,238 pounds of obscene pictures and photographs. Mr. Comstock, in his address, says:

> Take the weekly papers for boys and girls, filled with stories of reeking crime and sold everywhere. Through reading them boys and girls are ruined and become criminals and vagrants, and I have documents here to prove it. On January 12, two girls, one aged ten and the other eleven, ran away from home to become gypsies, and were away one night—the result of reading yellow-covered literature. A few days ago our energetic Inspector Byrnes, second in ability to none, arrested a young man, age nineteen, for murder, whose first remark was; 'I'm a 'tough' now, ain't I?" His imagination had been fired by reading of his disreputable heroes. On February 7 a young girl, crazed by this kind of reading, committed suicide. In November last four boys, not over sixteen, were arrested in Wilkesbarre Penn., who had formally organized themselves into a band of robbers, and prided themselves on being bandits. A young man arrested in South Framingham, Mass., for sending out the vilest kind of literature, said, pointing to a pile of boys' and girls' papers in his closet: "That's what brought me to this," and from a similar cause a young man in Buffalo set about robbing his employer's safe, meaning to seek adventures in the West. In Brooklyn I found that a boy, crazed by such reading, had led his younger brothers on till they had robbed their mother of over twenty-five articles. There are three publishers of blood-and-thunder literature here to-day, and they advertise 670 publications. A few weeks ago a young man read the details of a rail-road catastrophe. He thought he would like to see one, and tied a log on the track, while he lay in wait; but he was arrested. In a Western State two boys, one aged thirteen, and one fifteen, wrecked a train, killing the engineer. This literature transfers the knife and bludgeon from our hardened criminals to our boys and girls.

These bad publications are the promoters of every vice, of licentiousness, of intemperance, of lying, of dishonesty. They debauch the mind, and defile the heart, and are among the most powerful agencies known in wrecking character, and in inciting to sensuality. The law may be invoked against the public exposure and sale of such periodicals and pictures as most flagrantly violate the sense of decency. The greater danger lies in the reading of the dime novel, and the illustrated story paper, in which the poison is at least partially disguised.

There is occasion for concern in this matter. What are our children, at home or at school, reading? Parents sometimes find their children corrupted, and even ruined, before they have suspected the presence of the destroyer. The boy has become a drunkard before it was known that he tampered with drink. His purity and integrity have been lost, while he was thought to be free from every stain. The effects of this abominable reading are hid for a time. The dreadful leaven is fermenting, and assimilating the moral character, in secret. It long burrows in the mind before its presence is distinctly manifested. When the evil is discovered it may be too late to cure it.

Wholesome books and periodicals for our youth should be liberally patronized. Every home, in which there are children growing up, should be well supplied with a literature adapted to interest, instruct, and to promote sound religious and moral principles. Something can be done to counteract the evils of bad literature by cultivating in our children the taste for good reading. A taste for good reading. In regard to reading, there are taste and habit. If both of these can be enlisted on the side of virtue and intelligence the stronghold is tolerably secure.

And religious principle must be invoked. Our young people are instructed and warned in reference to the danger and the sin of intemperance and of dishonesty. They should also be warned against the peril of bad reading. To many it is the greatest of all perils, and the one that threatens to involve them in a total overthrow of character, and in irretrievable ruin. Taste, habit and conscience must all be cultivated and arrayed against the vulgar sin of buying and of reading licentious publications.

We have said that our homes should be liberally supplied with wholesome literature for the young. It would be well also if there could be good church libraries, and if our Sunday-school libraries could be enlarged and supplied with a more varied and attractive catalogue of books. Our Sunday-school papers, although serving an important purpose, should, if possible, be reinforced by an illustrated magazine of such literary merit as to commend it to our youth. Such a magazine may not be practicable now, but there is need for it in all of our evangelical churches.

More About the Flood.

The statement made week before last, that the inhabitants of the Yazoo valley, Mississippi, had not been driven from their homes by the rising waters of the Mississippi river, no longer conveys a true idea of the condition of the unfortunate occupants of the overflowed region. Since that writing the rise of the water has been unprecedentedly rapid, being at times as much as two feet in twenty-four hours, and had on Monday, the twentieth instant, reached an elevation at least twelve inches higher than the highest water ever before known by the oldest inhabitant of the Yazoo valley. There is not probably an acre of unsubmerged land between the Yazoo hills on the east and the highlands of Louisiana, sixty or seventy miles to the west. The water is, of course, of various depths, according to the elevation of the land. A small steamboat was seen to run across a plantation without obstruction even from the fences. It is not uncommon for a large steamboat to land at the door of a planter's house and take his family from the gallery on board the steamer. For more than a week the discomfited people have, from necessity, been leaving their houses, and seeking refuge wherever they could find it among their friends in the hills. Mules have been sent out by thousands, they being the most valuable species of movable property, while cows, hogs, and other domestic and wild animals, have perished in vast numbers. For several days the courthouse and other public buildings in Yazoo City were crowded with hundreds of negroes, and many slept upon the sidewalks for a night or two till they could find better quarters in camps among the hills. The water is over the first floor (and with many this is the only one) of the large majority of the houses in a region extending over hundreds of miles in length, and in places little, if any less, than a hundred miles in breadth. Think of children taking off their shoes at night, as usual, and, rising next morning, to find that the stealthy flood had crept in during the darkness and swept them away while they slept. Families lie down with dry floors, but must have dug-outs or skiffs brought in the next morning, or they must step into water when they rise from their beds. Some are drowned, and some perish from hunger. Some have been rescued from house-tops, and others from the tops of trees. The amount of suffering for food in the parts adjacent to Yazoo City is not yet supposed to be great, but must increase greatly before the water can be reasonably expected to subside.

Many kept their mules for a time, and some yet have them, in their gin-houses. Hundreds of negroes also occupy gin-houses, their little cabins having floated away or disappeared beneath the flood. Imagine fifty negroes in the upper story of a gin-house, and compelled to remain there for weeks, going in boats, a few at a time, to do their cooking, from day to day, on a mound two hundred yards distant, and you have a pitiful picture of the life many of them are living, and must perhaps continue to live for many weeks to come. Yet I know some wealthy planters and elegant ladies who voluntarily stay and share the hardships of the situation with the laborers on their places, even building scaffolds in their parlors and other apartments, there being no upper stories to their houses, and the water covering all the lower floors from two to four feet deep.

Nearly one-third of Yazoo City is under water. The people of the city, through relief committees and private beneficence, have done nobly in helping and relieving the distressed. Rev. Dr. Abbey and family came to the city some days since. The water is four feet deep in his office. He is now urging a call of the Legislature to pass a stock law for the benefit of the people of the overflowed region, as it is not expected that they will have any fences left when the waters shall have subsided. The Rev. J. M. Pugh is also a refugee in Yazoo City, the water covering his entire charge.

All this suggests several reflections. The work of the mound-builders appears in a striking light. The mounds may have been intended, in part, as places for burial, but they certainly afford, and I think were intended to afford, most important relief and comfort to the living in such times as these.

Levee-builders and the advocates of levees might take some special lessons from the present flood. How high levees would be required to hold all the water now in the Mississippi valley? Would fifty feet be high enough? Would levees answer their purposes at all while the mouths of the tributaries of the Mississippi are left open, unless all of them should be leveed to the highlands? If a levee fifty feet high should break, how would the damage compare with the breaking of a low one, or with the evils of an overflow without any levee at all?

The water, in the Yazoo valley at least, must go down slowly since all below the tops of the Mississippi levees must go out at or near the mouth of the Yazoo river.

Besides the sufferings during the overflow, and the diminution or possible loss of this year's crop in the inundated sections, there will probably be much severe sickness produced by decaying vegetation, and the occupancy of sodden houses, after the going down of the water.

Yet even in this great calamity, I think I see the compensations of Providence. The hundreds of hungry mules which I met ascending the hills near Yazoo City, a few days ago, found green pastures wherever they went. I doubt if any one ever before saw the hills of Mississippi covered with so rich a pasturage in the month of March.

The vast expanse of water lying along the great valley will probably so modify the atmospheric temperature as to save from killing frost the finest crop of fruit that we have had for more than half a dozen years.

God, by these great disturbing acts of his providence, seems to give new emphasis and power to his revealed word. At times men appear to be so engrossed by the cares and interests of this world that they lose all concern about the next. The gospel fails to attract their attention or impress their souls. How often, at such times, has a great earthquake, or a protracted and devastating war, or a frightful and deadly epidemic, or a vast and sweeping overflow, like the present, aroused them from indifference, shed new light upon the gospel, and given unwonted power to the preached word, by compelling them to realize, as they had not done, that "here we have no continuing city, but must seek one to come." Happy are they who heed the hints of Providence, and wisely interpret the postings of Jehovah's chariot wheels.

The White-House and Whisky.

The papers are quick to publish the fact that President Arthur had five or six different wines at his first State dinner, and are rather congratulating the nation that the White-House is delivered from the Puritanism of ex-President Hayes and wife. Well, we are sorry for the moral sense that can gloat over such a retrogression. The one fact in the Hayes administration, that wine was not allowed at the White-House, will never be forgotten nor cease to be admired. In the mansion of the highest officer of the nation an example of utmost sobriety should be set the people. Wine-tippling ought to be no more respectable than whisky-guzzling in the lowest slums of the city. Who can tell the influence of such an example in the executive mansion? If the widower President should marry soon it is to be hoped he will find a wife of the Mrs. Hayes' type, who will refuse to allow the White-House to become a pest-house of intemperance.

Labor vs. Idleness, etc.

No man, who has a healthy body and sound mind, should be without some steady occupation in life, some calling or trade, some worthy vocation, in which his faculties may find development, where his stock of vitality may be profitably expended, and where he can maintain his independence, preserve his self-respect, and be happy.

But every man not only owes this to himself, but he owes it to society also.

Society is only another name for a great family, whose members are bound to make common contribution for the general good, and to share in that good, individually, on the basis of individual contribution. Providence, which is the great presiding good, tenders certain natural blessings, such as air, sunlight and water, to every member of that family without cost. These are free to all, and the great Giver asks in return only gratitude. In addition, he provides the materials out of which his children are to draw the means of sustentation.

Having freely provided these natural blessings, and placed these means within the reach of all, the great Father has made labor the basis of all values, and the principle by which exchanges, which we call commerce, are to be regulated. Labor, by which we mean vital expenditure through the brain, or by the muscle, has been made the measure—is in fact the maker of values.

The great motions of the world are expenditure and compensation. Busy men are all the time pouring their life into the earth, and the earth is all the time sending its life back to them. The one is expenditure—labor; the other is the compensation that labor brings. "Labor" is, indeed, "the law of progress." This is the great universal, social law, under which man, as a worker, exists.

The man who seeks to get through the world without labor is recreant to his highest obligations. The greatest drones in society are those who are living upon the labor of others, without laboring themselves. In every commercial center, such, for example, as New Orleans, there are hundreds of people, well-dressed and able-bodied, who profess to be "hunting employment," but who can not be persuaded to engage in anything that demands hard, honest work. They want occupations that will yield large profits from the smallest amount of personal labor. They are really trying to find out how much they can get from the world for nothing. They are constantly looking out for "light work," but are sure to demand liberal wages. In many instances they would gladly forego even the "light work," and in place of the "liberal wages" accept a friendly loan from some minister or other persecuted party, who knows no other way of getting rid of the "gentlemanly employment hunter" than by granting his request, with the emphatic injunction: "You must pay me back this money next week!" Of course the "borrower," unless he be a man of unusually hard face, will not return "next week," and the creditor is rid of at least one persecutor.

Last Hours of Dr. Linfield.

The following extract from a letter written by Miss Annie E. Linfield, daughter of Rev. Dr. Linfield, shortly after her fathers death will be read with deep and tender interest:

Yes, our kind, ever tender loving father has passed from this world of suffering to the great and glorious home, in heaven, where his poor blinded eyes are now open and his bright intellect unclouded. Dear one, how patiently, uncomplainingly did he endure all those afflictions, his God alone knows. I have often gone in where he was sitting day after day and seen him painfully kneel down by the side of his chair (that he called "hope") and engage in prayer, and when he got up, his cheeks were wet with tears.

We could not follow him in his devotions, yet we let him lead until it was too painful for us to listen. We knew that a loving tender father understood him if we could not. Yes, it is well. We do not wish him back, we know he is enjoying "rest, sweet rest." How peaceful his countenance in death. How calm and unruffled just as he looked years ago in the sacred pulpit.

Our hearts were lightened when we looked upon him and saw the heavenly smile. The recollection of the suffering tired look faded from our view, and we could not associate the two. We feel the goodness of God in this specially, for he had not looked natural for months. His death was quiet and peaceful with his loved ones around him. I have often heard him express a desire to die in the midst of his family. It is very sad to think he has left us, never to see him more on earth. My heart is lonely and sad. We are bearing it as well as we could, God does comfort us in many ways. Dr. Johnson will ever be tenderly loved by us for his goodness to us. Many dear good friends have been with us, and do most affectionately sympathize with us. Our pastor and his wife will never be forgotten by us.

TAKING THREE ADVOCATES.—A lady writing from a town in Alabama, says: Inclosed please find two dollars for another years subscription to your NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. We had concluded to quit you, as we had subscribed for the Alabama Advocate, and take the Nashville Advocate too; but when the time comes we are not willing to part with you, we have found you of too much value, so we will try all three this year, notwithstanding the "hard times." You have our sympathy in your troubles with the big river, but don't get discouraged and think you are the only people that suffer; we haven't so much overflow, but we have our share of rain and wet weather, and are backward in farming matters.

The Richmond Christian Advocate, of March 16, says:

Dr. W. M. Patterson left us on Wednesday evening, the eighth, and went to Ashland, where he addressed the people on the subject of Mexico and her needs. His visit to our city was in every way a pleasant one to the preachers and people. They are glad to have seen and heard the man who has for more than four years stood like a "Stonewall" in the face of danger, persecution, and death, in the prosecution of his holy work of giving to the Mexican people a pure gospel. His presence among us has done us good, and will tend to bring the Central Mexican mission to the attention of our people, who have, strange to say, not taken, as a general thing, the interest in that work its importance demands. He spoke always of the great help and comfort the Rosebuds of Virginia had been to him in his work. He went on to the Baltimore Conference at Fredericksburg, and thence to Washington and Baltimore.

Dr. Fitzgerald in the Nashville Christian Advocate, sums up the situation as follows:

First. That the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has no thought of taking any action that will compromise in any way or to any extent its connectional integrity.

Second. That the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) has no thought of entering into any arrangement withdrawing its jurisdiction from any part of these United States.

Third. That all discussions, propositions, or expectations based upon any other conclusions, will fall to the ground.

Fourth. That as fraternity is a fact and is growing, it may wisely be left to grow without forcing. If genuine, it will take deeper root; if there be mixed with it any vicious elements growing out of the ignorance or the evil that is within us, time will bring the cure. The fraternity that has no patience, but insists on having its way at once, is misnamed.

Fifth. If we will see that our hearts are right before God, and take care of fraternity to-day, our successors will be able to manage the question in all its phases to-morrow. It is the last thing about which good men ought to wrangle.

Flood Notes.

Waterproof is now about five feet under water. The back water is coming in at the rate of from ten inches to a foot in twenty-four hours. Breaks below us and breaks above us. The oldest inhabitant remembers nothing like this. No one knows where it may stop. Business is suspended. The colored people are moving away in numbers. Many of our people are losing everything. The chances for making a crop this year are exceedingly small. St. Joseph and Vidalia are also suffering, though not so much as this place. The church here will only stand ten inches more. No one can estimate the losses to the people. I am standing on, or rather floating round about my post of duty. What to do is the bothering question. Everybody and everything is in a state of consternation. Very few can come to the services now, and when the church is under, what then? However I am content to await the issue, and trust in God. I am among as faithful a people as there is in any church, according to their means. Oh! that the king of heaven would rebuke the devastating waves.

ALFRED E. CLAY.

WATERPROOF, La., March 21, 1882.

—We deeply sympathize with Rev. James A. Ivy and his wife, of this city, in their great sorrow. Their beloved daughter, Alma, died at Staunton, Va., March 22, aged eighteen. Sister Ivy was with her in her last hours, but we believe she scarcely recognized her mother. Her disease was typhoid fever, and she had been ill sometime before Sister Ivy reached Staunton. In about two months more, had she lived, she would have graduated. Fair and young, she has fallen as a spring flower. She was a religious girl, a consistent member of the church, of rare intelligence, and of great sweetness of disposition. Considerate, affectionate and helpful as a daughter and sister, she was the joy of the home circle, and was universally loved and esteemed. The sorrowing mother returned home with the body of her precious child on Sunday last, and in the afternoon of the same day, the funeral and burial took place in the presence of a large and tearful company.

—The inundation is still prevalent throughout the Mississippi valley. It is, however, abating at Memphis, Vicksburg, Natchez, Shreveport, Monroe, and at most points above Natchez. The distress is still very great, and in lower Louisiana the flood is at its worst. The crest of the overflow is now upon this section, and since our last issue the sugar lands have suffered fearfully. It is hoped that the greatest danger will be over in a few days, and that in another week a decline in the stage of the river at New Orleans will be noted. Owing to the great inundation the business of New Orleans has been depressed—in most branches nearly paralyzed. The spring business has been nearly ruined, and a long, dull summer is at hand.

—It is with deep regret that we have heard of the death of Mrs. Mary Susan Butler, wife of Lawrence L. Butler, and daughter of Edward J. and Lavinia Gay, of this city. Mrs. Butler died at her home in St. Louis, Mo., Sunday, March 26.

She was an accomplished lady, vivacious and brilliant in mind, and graceful and attractive in person. She was the light and inspiration of the social circle, and the joy of her household. Possessed of every womanly virtue, the law of kindness was upon her lips, and her gentleness and goodness endeared her to a large circle of friends. May the God of all grace support the bereaved in this great sorrow. To her parents and to her devoted husband, Major Butler, especially, we tender our prayerful sympathy.

—An important meeting of the ministers and representatives of the churches of New Orleans was held, at Grunewald Hall, on Monday of this week to consider the Sabbath question, and to devise means to secure its better observance. Bishop Keener was called to the chair, and several addresses were made. By resolution a committee was raised to report provisions for the organization of a Sabbath League. The meeting adjourned to meet again Monday, April 3, at twelve M., at the same place.

IMPROVING.—We are gratified to be able to state that John S. Hill, the son of our brother, Rev. Felix R. Hill, who recently met with a serious injury, is improving; and it is hoped that he is in a fair way to recover. We make this announcement to meet the inquiries of many anxious and sympathetic friends of the family at a distance. Our young friend, John, has been a patient and heroic sufferer, and his fortitude of spirit, under the divine blessing, has contributed greatly to his improved condition.

—In the German churches of this city, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, there is a considerable revival influence. There have been a number of conversions and additions to the church during the past few weeks. A protracted meeting is now in progress at the Dryades Street charge. The pastor of this church, who is also presiding elder of this German district, Rev. Dr. Ahrens, reports the German work hereabouts, as generally prosperous.

REVIVAL AT OXFORD, GA.—The meeting in Oxford gets better steadily. Sunday, March 19, was a blessed day. In the morning eleven young men and one little girl were received into the church. Sunday night there were nearly one hundred at the altar; fifteen were happily converted. Many professors of religion have been wonderfully blessed. There have so far been as many as forty conversions. Nearly the whole college has been drawn into the meeting in some way. Let our friends pray mightily that all our young men may be saved. We have never known a better meeting in Oxford and we have known it well since 1850.—Wesleyan Christian Advocate, Mar. 25.

While, says Zion's Herald, the impossibility of winning the Chinese to a Christian civilization is being urged in Congress, and the old story of the inferiority of races is once more repeated, in addition to the successful work of Protestant missions in China and in San Francisco, we have in Boston and vicinity several Sunday-schools composed of Chinese in one eighty pupils who exhibit remarkable interest and great proficiency. There are such schools, also, in New York city. Many Chinese students, educated in our seminaries, have been happily converted, are members of the church, some looking to the ministry, and others settling down to regular forms of business, every way preferring this country to their own.

Rev. Dr. W. W. Leftwich writes to the Nashville Christian Advocate: I am just from the great revival at Huntsville, Ala. It is remarkable in many respects. It has reached all classes from the old man of eighty-three years to the little child. All the churches are interested, and Dr. Bryson, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, and Bros. Lovett and Kane, of the Cumberland Presbyterian and Baptist Churches, are supporting Bro. Thompson in the great work with great zeal and energy. Bros. Brown, Duncan, Rutledge, and Jones have all done efficient service. When I left the pastors estimated the conversions at nearly two hundred. The noon-meeting for business men in the court-house were doing great good, and reaching a very influential class of citizens. The whole city was stirred with religious interest, and there is no reason why hundreds more may not be converted and added to the church.

F., writing in the Texas Christian Advocate, says:

Fraternity is an accomplished fact, which has been greatly strengthened by the Ecumenical Conference; and while smaller bodies of Methodism may, it is hoped they will, under the warming influences of fraternal Methodistic zeal, come into closer embrace—even organic unity—it may be doubted if the two great Methodist Episcopal bodies in the United States—with their millions of communicants, herculean educational interests, mammoth publishing houses, missionary enterprises and a domain so rich and vast—would add to their material or moral force by hooks of organic steel and iron bands of cohesive power. To march under the same colors in two grand divisions for the conquest of the world to Jesus Christ may be more in the nature of the divine mission than to be massed into one unwieldy consolidated body, where denominational pride and the lust of power are apt to find a congenial soil and a luxuriant growth. The history of the church abounds with mournful evidences of this appalling danger. Let the two Methodisms remain intact—well rounded and clean cut in their organic form, each vieing with the other which can most love and best serve. Let the unity be that of the spirit.

The Anti-polygamy Bill, reported from the Judiciary Committee by Senator Edmunds, has been passed by the Senate without any material change in its provisions. The bill so amends the existing statute in regard to polygamy as to make the description of the offense more definite and is in this respect an improvement. It makes cohabitation with more than one woman a misdemeanor, for which it prescribes a specific punishment. It changes the law in regard to juries so as to exclude, in all trials of offenses forbidden in this bill, all persons from serving as jurors who are polygamists or who believe in polygamy, and provides that they may be challenged on these grounds and examined by the court under oath. It disfranchises polygamists and disqualifies them to hold any office. It abolishes all the existing registration and election offices in the Territory of Utah for the time being, and substitutes there for a commission of five persons, to be appointed by the President, who shall have the entire charge of the next election of members of the territorial legislature to provide by-laws, not inconsistent with those of the United States, for future elections. The bill is a decided advance upon anything previously attempted by Congress and possibly may be sufficient to cure the evil. And yet we agree with the opinion expressed in the debate by Senator Sherman, that the true remedy, the one that will be sure to do the work is to dispossess the people of Utah of all political power for the time being and govern the territory by a commission, under the authority of the United States, as is done in the District of Columbia, and to continue this government until polygamy is thoroughly rooted out of Utah. Even Senator Edmunds said that he was by no means sure that this would not be necessary in the end.—N. Y. Independent.

Woman's Missionary Advocate, March, appeals for more subscribers, and it is worthy of general favor. Will our friends take heed to the following?

Wanted, two thousand new subscribers before the first of May. Why? Because we believe the paper is doing good; we hear it on all sides, and have never heard that it has done our cause, or any person, harm. We wish, therefore, to enlarge this capacity, to strengthen this power, and thus increase its usefulness many fold. We want the subscribers by the first of May because, first, the General Executive Association meets at that time, and if there is no evidence that the Woman's Missionary Advocate is growing in favor, and fulfilling its duty, it should be promptly suspended; secondly, because every new subscriber obtained now places fifty cents in the treasury of our Woman's Missionary Society, and we need every dollar we can get to carry on successfully the work existing, and that which is even now contemplated.

Serious apprehensions are entertained at Athens by the continual sinking of the island of Chios. It is feared that the entire island will before long disappear beneath the waves. Earthquakes are of constant and, indeed, increasing occurrence, and hot springs are everywhere appearing.

The Revision of the Old Testment is finished, with the exception of Ecclesiastes and Song of Solomon. The second revision will take the whole of 1882, and the finished work will be published in 1883.

PASTORAL CHANGE.—The Rev. Linus Parker is appointed preacher in charge of Louisiana Avenue Church in place of Rev. Frank E. Butler, who leaves in consequences of his poor health and earnest desire to be relieved from the active work.

CHRISTIAN KEENER, P. E.

March 24, 1882.

TO OUR AGENTS.—The publisher would be greatly obliged if all agents would remit promptly collections for subscriptions, or, at least once a month, send amount on hand with names from whom collected. It is hoped that extra efforts will be made this year to secure a large number of new subscribers, and as the General Conference will meet in May the paper will be unusually interesting and of great value to every member of the church.

MARCH.

March! March! March! They are coming
In troops to the line of the wind;
Red-headed woodpeckers drumming,
Gold-crested thrushers behind;
Sparrows in brown jackets hopping
Past every gateway and door;
Finches with crimson caps stopping
Jnst where they stopped years before.

March! March! March! They are slipping
Into their places at last
Little white lily-buds dripping
Under the showers that fall fast.
Buttercups, violets, roses;
Snowdrop and bluebell and pink.
Throng upon throng of sweet posies,
Bending the dewdrops to drink.

March! March! March! They will hurry
Forth at the wild bugle-sound—
Blossom and birds in a flurry,
Fluttering all over the ground.
Hang out your flags, birch and willow
Shake out your red tassels, larch!
Grass-blades, up from your earth-pillow
Hear who is calling you—March!

PATCHED EGGS.—During the spring of 1880, while arranging a nest to set a turkey I accidentally cracked five of twelve eggs by laying the shelve of an ax upon them. A lady living on the place who had successfully patched a hen egg which had been broken some days before the time for hatching proposed to patch these, four of which were patched in the following manner: After having carefully picked off the broken fragments of shell with a pointed instrument, without breaking the skin, a piece of egg shell was pasted over the broken part with a paste made of white of egg and flour, then slowly dried by a fire and placed under the turkey. They hatched and the turkeys were raised, the patched shells being found in the nest after the eggs were hatched.

SCRIBNER.

AMBER SORGHUM IN TENNESSEE.—I planted about ten acres of amber sugar cane this year about long enough before the drouth set in for the seed to sprout and come up. I planted on medium old land, without any fertilizer. I broke up the land in the ordinary way I mean by that, rather slovenly, smoothed it over with a Thomas harrow, and streaked it off with a bull tongue plow; drill the seed six or eight seeds to the hill, and got a medium stand. I chopped the field over once, and where it appeared too thick, cut it out to a stand. I plowed it out twice with a double shovel. The cane grew slowly through the drouth, but it maintained its green color and grew along slowly until the fall rains set in, then it grew and threw up its sprouts rapidly. Indeed some farmers told me that the cane grew faster than anything they ever saw. Each seed appeared to throw up from six to eight stalks. The rows were from three to four feet apart, and the cane thickened up so that you could see only a short distance down the rows. Had I planted earlier, at the opening of spring, I should have had an immense crop on the ground, but I intended the ground for German millet, which I sowed, but finding the seed would not germinate to give me a good stand, I changed to the amber sorghum, and that made it too late. Otherwise I could have worked off the cane the latter part of July instead of the first of October, and would have had as large a second crop as the one I got. As it was, I was more than satisfied with the crop.

I care little for the sugar or syrup it is said to yield. Its value as a forage plant to the stock feeder is what I am after. To give some idea of the value and yield of the ten acres half crop, I would say that really I can not see how I could have carried my stock without it through the past fall. I was fattening a pen of fifty hogs, a pen of oxen, a pen of twenty mules, and a pen of about fifteen weaning colts. It seemed to me that it was impossible to get suitable food to properly feed this stock upon. As long as my Means grass lasted I cut that by the wagon load, cut it up and mixed with cut up sheaf oats, and fed my mules and cattle with that, and they did finely. For the hogs I cut and fed green corn and stalks, but they did poorly on that. As these things began to disappear the sorghum had matured, and I commenced cutting that by the wagon load and throwing it, stalks, fodder and seed, into the hog-pen, and I never had hogs fatten faster when fed on corn. I ran the stalks through my cutter and fed my cattle and mules upon it. They ate it greedily and fattened fast. No symptom of ill-effects upon any animal appeared; the cattle soon fattened up, and were sent and sold in the market for the best price. The hogs at the time of killing were in about as good condition as I usually kill them, and I fed very little corn. The mules did well upon it.

At the proper time, early in October, I had a portion of the crop cut and ground up, and made between nine and ten barrels of syrup, containing from fifty-two to fifty-six gallons each by actual measure. It was worth at the mill fifty cents per gallon. I saved from the cane ground up about one hundred bushels of seed; had thirty-nine bushels of it threshed and bagged; worth now five or six cents per pound. I kept part of the cane standing in the field to feed my hogs, cattle and mules until near frost. In addition to these things an immense amount of sprouts put up from the roots, and grew from half a leg to waist high. I turned forty head of cattle upon it, and kept them there till after frost, and they had eaten all down. I then broke up the ten acres of land and sowed it in wheat, and secured a good stand. This ten acres of sorghum was worth more to me than any twenty-five acre crop I had on my place, and will pay better to the acre every year than any other crop.—J. B. M., in Country Gentleman.

RAISING TURKEYS.—Select by weight the largest fowls to breed from; if possible, have the gobblers from two to four years old. The gobbler and hen should not be related to each other. Have no more than four hens to each gobbler, and do not starve them during the winter. Watch them closely about laying time, as they nearly always hunt a nest the day before they deposit their first egg. Make a good large nest in some building that you can confine them in, and next morning after they hunt their nest, catch them, and shut them up in the place where you made the nest, for after they have laid one egg there they will always go back to that nest. If they choose a good place of their own accord, I let them alone; though I put a few common hen eggs in the nest and take out the turkey eggs every day, and keep them in a cool place, as heat injures them quicker than cold, provided it does not freeze. I let each turkey set the first time she wants to; but let no young turkeys run with a common hen, for if they do so a half a dozen times, they are more trouble than fifty running with a turkey hen.

The advantage of letting turkeys set on their first laying of eggs is this; the young turkeys are hatched before the weeds and grass get high enough to wet and befoul them in the mornings. I watch them two or three days, that no weak ones are lost; then they get no more attention, only feeding when they come to the house. On no account give them raw food when small—I fed mine on corn bread; sometimes soak it in sour milk and sometimes give them curd. Never shut them up unless it rains hard.

I have been raising turkeys for several years, and have never had but one sick one yet. Most of my chickens died with cholera last fall, and one of my turkeys took it very bad; his flesh had turned dark colored when I found him. I gave him a pill of assafœtida the size of a pea and about a tablespoonful of equal parts of sulphur, cayenne pepper and rosin (thought it would either kill or cure him) and he got well. I gave the others sulphur twice a week for about a month, and none of them took the cholera.—Rural World.

HORSE-RADISH.—Horse-radish is more frequently tolerated than cultivated on the farm. It is often found occupying some odd corner, making a slovenly weedy patch, from which a few pieces are taken as wanted in the spring. When left to itself it takes such thorough possession of the soil that it is difficult to get rid of it. The only way to keep under control is, to plant the roots, let them grow one season and then dig the whole up. If left longer it will make trouble, and the roots will not be so good. Sets, are the small side roots, about six inches long, and half an inch or less in diameter. They are made when trimming the roots for use or for mark to as they must be planted right end up, the top part is cut off square and the lower end with a slant. In this shape they are sold at the seed stores, but enough for the home garden may be dug from any accessible patch. Market gardeners plant them between the rows of early cabbages; if they start before the cabbages are mature, the tops are cut off in hoeing; when the cabbages are removed the horse-radish is allowed to grow. In the family garden a small planting may be made without reference to the cabbage or other crops, planting the sets eighteen inches apart each way, with a sharp pointed dibble, having the tops of the set three inches below the surface. Be sure and take up the roots, large and small, in autumn or early next spring.—American Agriculturist.

GREENS, WILD AND CULTIVATED.—In spring nearly every one likes what our forefathers called "pot herbs," and are classed by us as "greens." A large number of wild plants, from dandelion and marsh marigold (called cowslips, erroneously,) to nettles and pokeweed, are made to do service in different parts of the country. While several wild plants are very acceptable, none equal spinach, and some others. The time expended in gathering these scattered plants, if devoted to sowing a few rows of spinach, would give more satisfaction, and the greens be at hand when wanted. Spinach is hardy, own brother to the beet; if in fairly rich soil it may be used from the time it is large enough to thin, up to the showing of the flower-stalk. Sow in rows, like beets, twelve inches apart; when large enough to be crowded, thin out a portion for use; repeat the thinning two or three times, leaving the last plants six or eight inches apart, and these should be used before the seed-stalk begins to run up. The first sowing may be among the earliest in the garden and again every two weeks until the end of May. Sown later than this it runs to seed too soon. For midsummer, the New Zealand spinach is an excellent substitute. Do not sow until the soil is well warmed, in May, drop the seeds six inches apart in the drill, and when up, thin to a foot apart. The plant spreads and the rows should be two feet apart. The excellence of young beets is mentioned elsewhere. Some persons sow beet seed expressly to use the young plants for greens.—American Agriculturist.

MAKING AND USING MANURE.—No man is a truly successful farmer who allows his land to grow poor while he is cultivating it. He may make money for the time and put it in his pocket; but he does so at the cost of his successors. He takes something from the soil and gives nothing in return. This can not be continued without beggary of both land and occupant. Writers and speakers tell of the "inexhaustible" fertility of the West. I never hear that word without being annoyed. We might as well say that we can consume a part and still have the whole; not only that, but keep on doing so far an indefinite term of years, and still have the whole remain to us. This mistaken idea of an inexhaustible soil has already cost the West a great sum of money, and will inevitably cost many millions more. Much has already been done to put an end to this ruinous system of forever taking from the soil and putting nothing back. Much remains still to be done.—Tribune.

FARMERS AND POULTRY.—The Home Circle says farmers almost invariably have plenty of room to spare for keeping a reasonable number of fowls to advantage. Cheap houses can be built on their premises to shelter a hundred or two birds that will give them fresh eggs in abundance (to use in the household or sell for cash) in the right season. There is very little labor to be performed in the proper care of a few scores of nice fowls during the breeding season. And a large—very large—percentage upon the cost and keeping, all told, is the natural and certain return there may be realized to any farmer anywhere, on a small or large scale, where this business is conducted as it should be. Why, then, should not our farmers avail themselves of this plainly remunerative adjunct upon their premises?

There is more money in good poultry-rearing (considering its cost,) by one-half, to be had annually than can be realized from the hogs or the sheep on a farm. And yet the latter are fed and housed and bred everywhere, to the entire neglect, almost, of fowl stock. Our farmers will do well to look into this thing, says the writer, who goes on to state that he earnestly recommends it to the careful consideration of those who have the facilities at hand to rear good poultry at a remunerative rate, but who have neglected this well-paying branch of rural economy.—Mobile Register.

Household.

DUTCH SAUCE.—1. Put one and a half tablespoonfuls of vinegar in a sauce-pan, and reduce it on the fire to one-third; add two ounces of butter and the yolk of an egg. Place the sauce-pan on a slow fire, stir the contents continuously with a spoon, and as fast as the butter melts add more, until one-half pound is used. If the sauce becomes too thick at any time during the process, add a teaspoonful of cold water and continue stirring. Then put in pepper and salt to taste, and take care not to let the sauce boil. When it is made—that is, when all the butter is used and the sauce is of the proper thickness—put the sauce-pan containing it into another filled with warm (not boiling) water until the time of serving. 2. Boil a small quantity of mace and allspice, roughly pounded, in a little water, heat up and strain the yolks of three eggs with about a tumblerful of this water when cold, add salt to taste, and about three ounces of fresh butter. Put this mixture into a bain-marie, and never cease stirring until the sauce thickens, then stir in (off the fire) the juice of a lemon.

TIMBALE OF MACARONI.—Take one-half pound of Naples macaroni, boil it until quite soft, drain it on a cloth, cut it in pieces half an inch long, well butter a plain mould, line it with buttered paper, place it in the macaroni endwise, so as to give the appearance of honeycomb when turned out. Make a paste thus: Put a gill of water, and a little salt into a stew-pan to boil. When boiling throw into it a tablespoonful of flour, leave it a few minutes, then stir in one egg, turn it on to a plate until wanted. Take a pound of veal cutlet, remove the skin and bone, pound it in a mortar and add to it half the quantity of the above paste and a quarter of the quantity of the butter, with salt, pepper and nutmeg to taste; mix all together, add one whole egg and three yolks, pass it through a wire sieve, stir in a gill of white stock or milk, pour it into the mould and steam for half an hour. Serve with truffle or brown sauce.

FRYING POTATOES.—The whole secret of fried potatoes is to have sufficient fat to cover them, and to have this fat hot enough. Cut the potatoes (raw) into slices as thick, say, as a penny; keep them in water till they are wanted; then dry them thoroughly and throw them into fat, heated considerably above boiling water point. Directly they begin to turn color, take them out, as they will get darker after being taken out of the fat. Cold cooked potatoes may be fried; but they must not be allowed to remain in the fat long. Cut up some cold, hard potatoes into pieces half an inch thick, and throw them into the fat till the edges begin to turn color, then take them out, drain them on a cloth, and put them in a dish, with a little butter and some chopped parsley. This is a very nice way of serving potatoes.

ONION SOUP.—Take half a pound of nice, fresh butter, put it into a large sauce pan and let it melt slowly, but not brown at all. Cut up very finely ten good sized onions, put them into the melted butter, dredge in a little flour, and let the onions stew slowly for fifteen or twenty minutes, stirring them occasionally. Then pour in one quart of boiling water, dredge in a little more flour, and mix all well together. Add a teacupful of sweet milk and boil for fifteen minutes, stirring often. Beat up the yolks of two eggs, and after the soup is taken from the fire stir them in rapidly for a few minutes. Serve with bits of toasted bread in the tureen. Season with salt and pepper, but not till just before taking up, as the butter will nearly salt it enough.—S. O. A., in Country Gentleman.

POTATO SALAD.—When one has become tired of hot vegetables, this makes a pleasing addition to the bill of fare. Slice, very thinly, six cold potatoes; chop very fine one small onion, or cut in rings; boil two eggs hard, and, when cooled, rub the yolks smooth with two or three tablespoonfuls of sweet cream. Add a small teaspoonful of salt, a little pepper, and a sprinkling of mustard; beat the whites of the eggs, and add the potatoes and onion; stir in one tablespoonful of strong vinegar—more if vinegar is liked. Turn the dressing over the salad and serve for lunch, dinner, or tea.

CREAM OF BARLEY SOUP.—A teacupful of barley well washed; three pints of chicken stock, an onion and a small piece of mace and cinnamon. Cook slowly together five hours; then rub through a sieve, and add one and a half pints of boiling cream or milk. If milk, add also two tablespoonfuls of butter. Salt and pepper to taste. The yolks of four eggs, beaten with four tablespoonfuls of milk or cream, makes the soup very much richer.

PIGEONS ON TOAST.—Split some young pigeons down the back, wipe them, season with pepper and salt, rub with butter, sprinkle lightly, with flour, and broil over a clear fire. Toast some neat, thin slices of bread, butter them thickly, and put a pigeon on each slice, arranging about them some sprigs of fine watercress.

CURRANT JELLY.—To make currant jelly of gelatine, take a box of Cox's or Chamber's gelatine (I prefer the latter;) dissolve it according to the directions which come with it, adding a pint of the finest currant jelly. The jellies of commerce are colored and flavored with acids which I would not advise any one to use. Currant jelly may mould by not being kept in a perfectly dry place.—Aunt Addie., in Country Gentleman.

A NICE DESSERT.—Take some nice apples, pare, core and bake them. When quite soft take them up, mash them fine, adding a small lump of butter, some powdered sugar and a little nutmeg, if liked, and the white of an egg, beaten to a stiff froth. Make a soft custard of the yolk of the egg, one spoonful of corn-starch, a little essence of vanilla and a pint of milk. Pour over the apple and put in a cool place until ready to serve.

BAKED APPLES.—Take easily-cooked apples, pare them and take out the core from the stem end, not breaking through the other side. Fill the cavity thus made with some preserve or canned fruit. Place them in a baking pan and put a little water and sugar around them, and bake in a quick oven.

BOILED RICE.—Plain boiled rice is apt to be rather insipid and that, and to give it more flavor squeeze the juice of a lemon over it, and when you dish it out place a very thin bit of lemon in the middle of each saucer, and pour the sauce over it.

Scientific.

WHERE THE COMPASS NEEDLE POINTS.—I beg to state that the reasons why the needle points to the northerly direction is that the earth in itself is a magnet, attracting the magnetic needle as the ordinary magnets do, and the earth is a magnet as the result of certain cosmical facts, much affected by the action of the sun. These laws have periodicities, all of which have not as yet been determined. The inherent and ultimate reason of any fact in nature, as gravity, light, heat, &c., is known further than that it is in harmony with all facts of nature. Even an earthquake is in perfect harmony with and the direct resultant of the action of forces acting under general laws. A condensed explanation in regard to the needle pointing to the northward and southward is as follows: The magnetic poles of the earth do not coincide with the geographical poles. The axis of rotation makes an angle of about twenty-three degrees with a line joining the former. The northern magnetic pole is at present near the arctic circle on the meridian of Omaha. Hence the needle does not everywhere point to the astronomical north, and is constantly variable within certain limits. At San Francisco it points about seventeen degrees to the east of north, and at Eastport, Me., as much to the west. At the northern magnetic pole, a balanced needle points with its northern end downward in a plumb line. At San Francisco it about dips sixty-three degrees, and at the southern magnetic pole the south end points directly down. The action of the earth upon a magnetic needle at its surface is of about the same force as that of a hard steel magnet, forty inches long, strongly magnetized, at a distance of one foot. The foregoing is the accepted explanation of the fact that the needle points to the northward and southward. Of course, no ultimate reason can be given for this natural fact in nature.—Prof. Patterson, of United States Coast Survey.

THE WIND AS A MOTIVE POWER.—Turning, now, to sources of energy derived from sun-heat, let us take the wind first. When we look at the register of British shipping and see 10,000 vessels, of which about 10,000 are steamers and 30,000 sailing ships, and then we think how vast an absolute amount of horse-power is developed by the engines of those steamers, and how considerable a proportion it forms of the whole horse-power taken from coal annually in the whole world at the present time, and when we consider the sailing ships of other nations, which must be reckoned in the account, and throw in the little item of windmills, we find that, even in the present day of steam ascendency, old-fashioned wind still supplies a large part of all the energy used by man. But, however much we may regret the time when Hood's young lady, visiting the fens of Lincolnshire at Christmas, and writing to her dearest friend in London (both sixty years old now if they are alive,) describes the delight of sitting in a bower and looking over the wintry plains, not desolate because "windmills lent revolving sublimation to the scene," we can not shut our eyes to the fact of a lamentable decadence of wind-power. Is it decadence permanent, or may we hope that it is only temporary? The subterranean coal-stores of the world becoming exhausted surely, and not slowly, and the price of coal is upward bound—upward bound on the whole, though no doubt it will have its ups and downs in the future as must be the case in respect to every marketable commodity. When the coal is all burned, or long before it is all burned, when there is so little of it left, and the coal mines from which that little is to be excavated are so distant and deep and hot that its price to the consumer is greatly higher than at present, it is most probable that windmill or wind-motors in some form will again be in the ascendant, and that wind will do man's mechanical work, on land at least, in proportion comparable to its present doing of work at sea. —Popular Science Monthly.

ACCUMULATION OF "EAR-WAX."—Dr. James Patterson Cassels states that the blocking up of the ear with wax caused more or less complete deafness in seventy out of five-hundred cases coming under his observation, and that these accumulations arises from many causes, chief among them being the habit of overcleanliness which possesses some persons, and by which they are induced to make attempts to clean out the canal of the ear by such means as the point of a wet towel, hont hair-pins, and sometimes even common pins and matches; the circumstances of such persons not enabling them to use the more aristocratic "auralavo," concerning which he says that no instrument has been introduced of late years so well adapted to cause accumulation of wax in the ear. On the other hand a smaller proportion of cases were due to other causes, such as diseases or deformity. Deep probing of the ear is eminently injurious and should never be indulged in. The proper time to attend to these accumulations is when there is a sensation of tickling at the orifice of the ear which causes one involuntarily to carry his finger-tip to it and twirl it in the orifice, with the result of bringing away a greater or less quantity of wax.—Glasgow Medical Journal.

MAKING FLOUR BY ELECTRICITY.—Flour was formerly made by simply grinding wheat at one operation to the finest possible flour, and then separating by sieves the flour from the bran, necessarily grinding in much of the bran with the flour and discoloring it, while very much of the best material was separated with the bran and lost. The later common method is to grind very coarsly the wheat several times, using strong blasts of air between each grinding to separate the bran from the granulated interior portion, and at last crush it to flour, relieved of all the bran. The new electric method consists in passing the middlings under revolving hard-rubber cylinders, electrified by contact with sheep-skin. The particles of bran fly up to meet the rubber, from which they are turned off in a side channel, the purified middling, freed from bran, passing through rollers to become fine flour.

—The last sewer explosion in London has shaken people's nerves considerably. "London has discovered," says the Daily Telegraph, "that it is undermined in every direction by a net-work of pipes filled with a gas which, when mixed in a certain well-known proportion with air, becomes at once terribly explosive: that this net-work is divided off according to the districts served by the different gas companies into special sections, and that each section is liable, from a single act of carelessness at any point within its area, to be suddenly involved in a common ruin."

Waifs from the Sunset Sea.

BY W. WALTER PRATHERSTON.

CARPINTERIA.

A few miles below Point Concepcion, which is the most Western point of Southern California, there lies on an open road-stead called "the bay," the beautiful little city of Santa Barbara, built on the site of an old Mexican pueblo and mission by that name. Here, I say it with sadness and shame, Southern Methodism has no foothold, although, as a matter of course, it should have. Twelve miles down the coast from Santa Barbara or over a low spur of the mountains which juts into the sea, there lies, between Sierra de Santa Nynez and this sunset sea, a beautiful valley called Carpinteria.

A legend, the verity of which I will not avouch, says that long age, when Mexico held sway in this fair land, a carpenter, with his tools and cattle, owned and occupied this valley; hence its name, prononnced in Spanish Carpinteeah.

The valley is about five miles long, and a half wide. It is bounded on the North, East and West, by mountains, and on the South by the sea; and slopes gently from the mountains to the beach. It is dotted with neat little farms interspersed with royal live-oak. The wild picturesque tangle of its live-oak groves and chaparal covered mountain-sides, and the home-likeness of its neat farm-houses surrounded by luxuriant orchards and green growing fields of grain and beans, make an exquisite picture, especially when viewed from the over-towering mountains. On the North, the mountains are very tall, and break away into still taller heights beyond. Deep canyons, filled with ferns, maiden hair, gold, silver, bronze, miniature and gigantic, with mosses, creepers and grasses, in great variety, shaded by elders, live-oaks, and sycamores, cleave these heights at intervals and pour through the valley and into the sea, a wealth of the purest sweetest water. On the South, stretches this beautiful sunset sea, its deep blue in lovely contrast with the pale azure of the clear California sky. Through most of the year this beautiful sea lies calm as an infant sleeping, lending to the whole scene a dreamy aspect. Far out into the blue vastness lie like an enchantment, the mountainous islands of Anacapa and Santa Cruz, two individuals of that more numerous group called on our maps Santa Barbara Islands. Sometimes the air is very pure and clear, and the islands seem quite near, though in reality they are not less than thirty miles away; at other times a haze hangs over the sea, and they seem like the shadowy outlines of some far away land.

The winter barely threatens this valley, but never comes. The sheltering mountains shut him out; and the summer never comes, for the soft sea-breezes keep her fanned off; spring and autumn hand in hand, hold high carnival, and no one complains of it.

Here Southern Methodism obtained a strong foot-hold at an early date in the American history of Southern Culture. Here we have a neat church and the best parsonage in the Los Angeles conference, as well as a neat district parsonage. Here some of the best and most faithful workers of the Los Angeles Conference were ecclesiastically born. The sainted Jesse Franklin, whom I never saw, but of whom I have heard much, but never enough, was converted and licensed to preach, here he labored, lived, and died; and here yet may be seen his accomplished widow, and two noble boys. Here too began C. W. Harris, whose voice, though silenced for several years, by a diseased throat, is now raised for the Master, giving no uncertain sound. He followed me at San Louis Obispo, and is still there. I know him well, and yet know nothing but good of him. Here too began another Franklin, he began well, but alas! he fell by the way, not dead, but worse. Here may be seen Grandma Callis, a holy matriarch of the old school; in her plain sunbonnet, calico dress, and linge apron; who can tell you about the first Methodist sermon ever preached on the south west of California. Left a widow on the Texas border, she and five children, three sons and two daughters, none of whom were grown, crossed the plains of New Mexico, and Arizona in an ox-wagon, and wading sands and fording rivers, climbing mountains, and crossing deserts. She settled first near Santa Barbara, where, with her own hands, assisted by her boys, then quite young, she built her a house. I have seen the building, and can testify that it is no mean structure. It wears till yet the same roof nailed on by Grandma Callis' own hand. She afterwards assisted her boys to cut cord-wood which enabled them to get a start in the cattle business, by which they afterward lived, and in which they measurably thrived. Grandma Callis has seen the day when, even in California, the privileges of the gospel were appreciated; She, with her boys and girls went in their wagons, more than once, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles to attend the first Methodist camp meetings of this end of the State. They were held at El Monte, Los Angeles County. These long journeys were not fruitless. All of her children, now grown up to be father's and mother's of large families, are with her in the church. They stand as pillars at Carpinteria.

Many have been the "good meetings," and the good brethren and sisters tersely term them, held at Carpinteria. The memories of them are still green, and the results are still visible.

The little pulpit at Carpinteria has heard the burning eloquence of our Pierce and Kavanaugh as well as the halting efforts of minor minds.

I stood one morning on a mountain and gazed down into this valley. Nothing could be seen save a vast stretch of wavy fleece. Around it stood the mountains; beyond it rose the islands, above it bent the blue blue sky lit by a blazing sun. Carpinteria was wrapt in a sea-fog. The scene was grand and I shall never forget it.

In this lonely valley by the sunset sea, I spent a year of my clerical life, the memories of which will ever be golden.

Mrs. Gladstone.

Mrs. Gladstone, the eldest daughter of the late Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart., of Harwarden Castle, was born Jan. 6, 1812. She was married on July 25, 1839; her sister, Lady Lyttleton, being also married on the same day. Mrs. Gladstone has had eight children, and they are all living, with the exception of her second son. Her oldest son Mr. W. H. Gladstone, M. P., represents East Worcestershire, and her youngest son Mr. Herbert Gladstone, M. P., is the popular member for Leeds. The other son, the Rev. Stephen Gladstone, is rector of Hawarden.

That Mrs. Gladstone takes an interest in politics was evidenced by her devoted attendance on her husband during his memorable Midlothian campaign, by her presence at the recent Leeds demonstration, and by the sympathetic aid she has rendered the Premier on other critical occasions. But she is more deeply interested in the moral and social condition of the people, especially of the rural population of Hawarden. She encourages horticulture and horticulture among them, and stimulates to the cottages a spirit of rivalry regarding the neatness, order, and cleanliness of their homes. It is thus that she exerts her influence in improving the houses and homes of Hawarden, and in all these beneficent and benevolent works she is heartily supported by her family, while her husband delights to take part in local efforts for the common good.

In London Mrs. Gladstone's name is associated with such benevolent movements as homes for working girls, convalescent homes, hospitals, and other institutions for the relief of the suffering or the amelioration of the condition of the people. Mrs. Gladstone is in sympathy with all the more prominent movements for increasing the well being of the people. According to a paper read at the Temperance Jubilee, held in London last year, Mrs. Gladstone and her sister, Lady Lyttleton, were among the very first to give encouragement to organized temperance efforts in Wales, and indications are not wanting of her continued interest in that important movement.

But her philanthropies exemplify the adage, "if you want anything well done, do it yourself;" and probably her best work for humanity has been done under her own personal direction and supervision. In 1862, which was the first year of the Lancashire cotton famine, Mrs. Gladstone visited the districts where the misery was greatest, and among other methods of practically alleviating it, she imported a number of starving men to Hawarden, where she employed them in making new paths and roads in the park. She also established at Hawarden an Industrial Home for Distressed Lancashire Girls. In 1864 Mrs. Gladstone set on foot the Night Refuge in in Newport Market, Soho, which still exists, and has, under the same roof, an excellent industrial School for Boys connected with it. In 1866, during the outbreak of cholera in London, Mrs. Gladstone started an Orphan Home at Clapton for those children whose parents had died of cholera, and likewise a Convalescent Home for adults and children recovering from the epidemic. In 1867, the advantages of a permanent Convalescent Home for the East End of London having been represented to Mrs. Gladstone by Dr. Andrew Clark, of the London Hospital, she established one at Sunresbrook, which, in 1869, was removed to Woodford Hall, Essex, where it now is, in full working order, receiving men, women, and children free, owing to the generosity of the subscribers and donors. In 1871, the orphans having been removed to Hawarden, the houses at Clapton were used temporarily for small-pox convalescents, and when the epidemic was over became a Home for Incurables until 1876, when Mrs. Gladstone established in lieu thereof a small House of Rest at Hawarden, and the Clapton houses were sold.

The Orphan Home at Hawarden has about twenty-eight boys, and a few Industrial girls to do the housework. The Convalescent Home at Woodford has from 90 to 100 beds.—House and Home.

THREE WIVES.—Three men of wealth meeting not long since in New York, the conversation turned upon their wives. Instead of finding fault with women in general, and their wives in particular, each one obeyed the wise man's advice, and "gave honor unto his wife."

"I tell you what it is," said one of the men, "they may say what they please about the uselessness of modern women but my wife has done her share in securing our success in life. Every body knows that her family was aristocratic and exclusive and all that, and when I married her she had never done a day's work in her life; when W. & Co. failed, and I had to commence at the foot of the hill again she discharged the servant and chose out a neat little cottage and did her own housekeeping until I was better off."

"And my wife," said a second, "was an only daughter, caressed and petted to death; and everybody said 'Well if he will marry a doll like that he'll make the greatest mistake of his life;' but when I came home the first year of marriage sick with fever she nursed me back to health, but I never knew her to murmur because I thought we couldn't afford any better style or more luxuries."

"Well, gentlemen, chimed in a third, "I married a smart, healthy, pretty girl, but she was a regular blue stocking. She adored Tennyson, doted on Byron, read Emerson, and named the first baby Ralph Waldo Emerson, and the second Maud; but I tell you what 'tis," and the speaker's eyes grew suspiciously moist, "when we laid little Maud in her last bed at Mt. Auburn my poor wife had no remembrance of neglect or stinted motherly care and the little dresses that still lie in the drawer were all made by her own hands."

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

600 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more; to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

HUMAN SUFFERING RELIEVED.

Intensely severe headaches, constipation of the bowels, deficiency of bilious secretions, flatulency, unsteadiness and weakness of muscular power, lowness of spirits, despondency, heart-fluttering, nervous debility and weakness promptly cured by using Brown's Iron Bitters. A true tonic, universally recommended by the medical profession.—Medical Journal.

—A powerful revival, said to be greater than anything since that of 1838, is in progress at Honolulu and other places in the Hawaiian Islands.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

CHATTANOOGA, March 21.—Elder Morgan, presiding elder of the Mormon Church for Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, was in the city to-day and will leave this city to-morrow for Colorado with 100 converts, which were gathered in the above States. At Nashville, he will be joined by 50 or 75 more.

He was interviewed by your correspondent to-day on the recent legislation enacted by Congress, and stated that the agitation is merely having the effect of popularizing the church in the South, and that they are receiving without any special effort 35 converts per month before the agitation commenced. The emigration of converts this year is heavier than ever before.

VICKSBURG, March 21.—The United States River Commission steamer Emma Etheridge, which arrived here at 5 P. M. brings news of the break of Alsatia levee, in Thompson's bend. This is regarded as the worst break which has occured south of Helena on the Louisiana side. J. B. Johnson, assistant-engineer of the Mississippi River Commission, states that from Alsatia to Goodrich, a distance of one mile, there are three breaks, all serious. The breaks occurred at Alsatia, Arlie and Mrs. Savage's, and the entire levee in the Bell place is gone. It is impossible to tell the depth of the break at this point. They occurred at 1 o'clock this morning, and were caused by the heavy storm which prevailed at that time. The fall of the water over the levee is about seven feet.

BAYOU SARA, March 21.—We learn through Mr. Walter Bell that the levee at Hog Point broke on Monday, 20, at about 4 A. M. The break is a very bad one, with no hope of repairing it. Just as we get this sad news ready for the wire another messenger brings more gloomy tidings that the Raccourci levee one mile above New Texas, and fronting the place of Alfred Morgan, gave way at 4 o'clock this morning. This break is about 75 yards wide and eight feet deep, and will inundate all the Old river and Raccourci country. This sounds the death-knell for Pointe Coupee. Before many days her fertile fields will be a sea of water, and words cannot express the loss of property and suffering of the people.

WASHINGTON, March 22.—The story goes that Cadet Whittaker is to be dropped out of the army in a way that will not hurt his feelings. The finding of the court martial is set aside, the disipline and honor of the army being deemed a small matter in comparison with party necessities.

The next step, it is reported, will be the pardon of Mason, who violated his orders, betrayed his trust and endeavored to commit murder.

SHREVEPORT, March 22.—State Senator L. M. Nutt died at his residence this afternoon, aged fifty-two years. He was a lawyer of distinguished ability, a member of the Constitutional Convention and a member of the State Senate from this district. He had been in ill health for many weeks. His death is universally regretted.

NATCHEZ, March 22.—Vidalia is nearly surrounded with back water, but the levee in front and on up to the L'Argent break remains intact, but the whole country is under water.

WASHINGTON, March 23.—The Secretary of War has ordered 300,000 rations to be issued at New Orleans for Louisiana, 200,000 at Memphis for Mississippi 50,000 at Helena, for Arkansas, and 10,000 each at Charleston, New Madrid and Gayoso for Arkansas. These are the first rations issued under the last appropriation of $150,000.

VICKSBURG, March 23.—Capt. Reilloy of the City of Vicksburg, whose boat arrived here to-day, reports a distressing condition of affairs at Goodrich's Landing, in Louisiana, and at Willow Point, in Goodrich's Bend. He placed one of his yawls at the service of the deluged people in that section many of whom were reported drowning for the need of boats, skiffs, etc., to rescue them and their families from the rapidly rising waters. A number of persons were reported drowned at Goodrich's, whose names are not given. On the other side of the river, in Issequena county, Miss., the whole county on the river side is submerged, and what is known as Stack Island Chute is no longer prohibited to steamboatman.

WASHINGTON, March 23.—The House of Representatives came to a vote today upon the bill to limit Chinese immigration. All the amendments were voted down, and the bill passed just as it came from the Senate by a voice of 167 to 65. But these figures do not represent the real strength of the opposition to the measure. The test vote was on Mr. Lasson's amendment to reduce the period of restriction from twenty to ten years. This was beaten 131 nays only, to 100 yeas. The 100 yeas were almost wholly Republicans, though there were some Democrats whose lack of wisdom and facility to the great principles involved led them to act with the opponents of the measure.

BOSTON, March 24.—Henry Wardsworth Longfellow, the sweet poet, the gentle scholar, the genial gentleman and admirable citizen, whose pure thoughts embodied in verse have carried joy and peace to the hearts of millions of many nations, this afternoon yielded up his life peacefully and calmly in the midst of his family. His gentle heart had scarcely ceased its pulsations when the sorrowful fact was made known to the denizens of Cambridge by seventy-five strokes upon the telegraph alarm bells, that being the number of his earthly years.

WASHINGTON, March 24.—The Senate Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River and tributaries agreed this morning upon a bill appropriating $5,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River, and $1,000,000 for the Missouri River, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans of the Mississippi River Improvement Commission. Part of the appropriation for the Mississippi is to be made immediately available, in order to repair as quickly as possible some of the damage caused by the recent floods.

PORT ALLEN, March 24.—A telegram from Grosse Tete reads as follows: "Fordoche under water. It is reported this afternoon that the levee in front of Max Meyer's plantation (old China place) on Fordoche is crevassed. Have abandoned work on Fordoche levee." This, I fear, will practically inundate the whole section.

PORT ALLEN, March 26.—My telegram of yesterday concerning the Grosse Tete country is fully confirmed. With a crevasse at the Mather, Woolfolk, Old Field and Bay Farm, and prospect of the levee on Mound plantation proper going and the whole levee on Mrs. Stockett's place is gone. The straw is broken, and those people send their call for boats to come to their rescue to save stock. How true "misfortune loves company," one disaster follows another. The river has risen here two inches in the last twenty-four hours.

The rain storm is over, leaving a heavy wind and big swell in the river, which is trying on our new work, and washing over in places. I have had no unfavorable reports to-day, and accept it as a good omen.

NATCHEZ, March 25.—River rose here about two inches in the last twenty-four hours and is still rising. The gauge now reads forty-seven feet five inches, which is twenty-two inches above the high water of 1874. Vidalia, La., is submerged to a depth of from two to three feet. The back water being higher than the river, the levee was cut to allow the water to run back into the river. The ferryboat Concordia is busily engaged all day in transporting people and stock from Vidalia, and overflowed districts back of there to this city. Natchez is crowded with refugees, and droves of stock are constantly passing through town.

VICKSBURG, March 26.—Boats continue to arrive from every quarter with news of the receding waters. Above and below on the Mississippi and in the tributary streams the waters are all falling and leaving the country to the care of the planters. Col. James Peeler, who was in the city to-day, reports that a full crop will be made on most of the Mississippi plantations.

BOSTON, March 26.—The burial services over the remains of the poet Longfellow took place at his late home at Cambridge, shortly after three o'clock this afternoon. They were entirely private, and none but relatives and near friends were present.

BATON ROUGE, March 26.—The Governor was informed by telegraph that at midnight a crevass occurred at Arizona, sixteen miles by the river, below Plaquemine, east bank of the river, supposed to have been cut, as it was in excellent order last evening.

DONALDSONVILLE, La., March 26.—I have just returned from the Arizona crevasse, east bank of the river, in the lower portion of Iberville. The break at five P. M. was about three hundred feet wide, and can not be closed, and it will be a waste of money to try it. This crevasse has already flooded the plantations above Point Clear, just below St. Gabriel Church, and is over Roscoe Blonin's place, southward, the Boote and Riverside plantations, and the water will go through Bayou Braud into Spanish Lake, and will flood all of New river and will cause the removal of at least two hundred families. From all information the levee was evidently cut.

VICKSBURG, March 27.—The reports to-day from the overflowed districts are generally very encouraging. The river is falling in all directions and many places are beginning to show up, and plowing is going on.

The steamer E. C. Carroll, from Sharkey, on Tallahatchie River, reports a fall of eighteen inches at that point, and that many planters are preparing to resume work.

PHILADELPHIA, March 27.—Senator Bon Hill is to-day reported by his physicians as being much better. He will remain here for several days.

CITY OF MEXICO, March 20.—President Gonzalez, in interview to-day with Gen. Palmer, assures him of the Executive friendship and appreciation of the Mexican National Railway Company's efforts in prosecuting the work. The President authorized Gen. Palmer to state that he would assist the company both officially and personally. This interview is considered important as showing the position of the Executive towards foreign enterprises.

The Coahuila Legislature indorses the contract for the establishment of a branch of the Mexican Mercantile Bank in that State. The bank was organized by native capitalists.

Mr. Clifford F. Hudson, of Elmira, N. Y., says: "My aged mother suffered greatly from poor digestion and general debility. She was always complaining of her liver, and her bowels often pained her greatly. She was very weak. I bought her a bottle of Brown's Iron Bitters, and she says, 'It goes right to the spot Clifford.' She has greatly improved since using this excellent medicine."

THE AMERICAN POSTOFFICE.—The American postoffice system is one of the most useful institutions of which our government can boast, and far more extensive than any one not connected with the department would be likely to believe without some little research and reflection. Its career of usefulness really began in 1753, the British government made Benjamin Franklin, the eminent philosopher and statesman, colonial Postmaster-General, with the then supposed to be munificent salary of £600, or about $3,000, for himself and his assistant. Franklin made many improvements and alterations in rates and routes, and held the position until 1774, at which time, he was discharged on account of being a patriot.

In 1784, after the adoption of the constitution of the United States, Congress established a postal system, and Samuel Osgood, of Massachussetts, was appointed to be the first Postmaster-General of the new nation. At the close of the first year there were seventy-five postoffices, and the total amount of postage received was $37,-935, giving the government a net income of $5,795. Ten years later, there were 903 offices, and the postage amounted to $380,804, the net revenue to $66,810. This was certainly a wonderful increase, but it seems very small in comparison with its growth since that date.

On the first of June, 1880, there were 42,989 offices; giving employment to 60,479 persons, and reached by 11,112 post routes having an aggregate length of 343,888 miles. The whole expense of carrying on this vast business was $39,101,820,28; 866,593,572 letters; 276,-446,717 postal cards; 695,175,624 newspapers; 53,472,275 magazines; 300,845,-480 books, circulars, etc., and 22,634,456 articles of merchandise were transported.

Great Britan is the only country which, in proportion to its population, can exceed, in its postal reports, these figures. With a population of 35,000,-000, against one of 50,000,000 in the United States, in 1880, 1,128,000,000 letters and 115,000,000 postal cards were delivered. If Americans wrote as many letters in proportion as the British, 1,610,000,000 would have to be handled.

The history of a postage stamp is quite interesting. The first one in America is thought to have been that used by E. A. Mitchell, the postmaster of New Haven, Conn., in 1847. In size and form, it closely resembled the present government stamp, and bore the words, "Paid, New Haven [illegible] 5 cents, E. A. Mitchell, P. M." It was made for the accomodation of the citizens, who had complained to Mr. Mitchell of the delay sometimes caused by their being unable to prepay letters except during business hours. From this little affair the stamp has become so popular that it is now used all over the world and exists in about 6,000 varieties.—Presbyterian Banner.

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.

2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.

3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

AN EASTER ODE.

BY HENRY ALFORD, D. D.

The calm of blessed night
Is on Judea's hills;
The full-orbed moon with cloudless light
Is sparkling on their rills;
One spot above the rest
Is still and tranquil seen,
The chamber as of something blest,
Amid its bowers of green.

Around that spot each way,
The figures ye may trace
Of men at arms in grim array,
Girding the solemn place;
But other hands are there—
And, glistening through the gloom,
Legions of angels, bright and fair,
Throng to that wondrous tomb.

Praise be to God on high!
The triumph hour is near;
The Lord has won the victory,
The foe is vanquished here:
Dark grave, yield up the dead—
Give up thy prey, thou earth;
In death he bowed his sacred head—
He springs anew on earth!

Sharp was the the wreath of thorns
Around his suffering brow;
But glory rich his head adorns,
And angels crown him now.
Roll yonder rock away
That bars the marble gate;
And gather we in bright array
To swell the Victor's state.

Hail, hail, hail!
The Lord is risen indeed!
The curse is made of none avail
The sons of men are freed!

Jasper's New South.

"THE SUN, HE DO MOVE."

The late discourse delivered by the sage of Richmond, the Rev. John Jasper, is scientifically heterodox. No one can deny that his belief in the sun's motion is very natural, as he uses the evidence of his own eyes. He saw the sun rise in the east and cast his shadows westward, and, in going down, cast them on the landscape eastward; there were countless visible proofs of the sun's motion, and even the Scriptures seemed to lend their concurrent testimony. It was very profound in him to reach the same conclusion that the philosophers held for five thousand years; and there was a touch of wisdom in his thus bringing out of his treasury a thing so new and yet so old. We must give him credit for bringing up to the public gaze an error wonderfully popular, and by which he surrounded himself with such notable company. On the other hand we must censure Bro. Jasper for unearthing this ancient difficulty which cost so much pains and time to bury. A man who uncovers the requiescat in pace of the past is an enemy of the public peace. Dr. Haygood, of Oxford has unwittingly fallen into Bro. Jasper's company, and has found a "new South;" and don't he see it move with his eyes? The truth is, the doctor of Oxford has been watching so long and intently the negro, that the motion of the six million has been imparted to himself, and now everything seems to be moving: the North southward, the South northward, and all things to an ultimate negro level, fraternally, politically, socially—the brother in black et al. He has mistaken a quasi-renaissance of the negro for new life in the South. In his article headed, "I Have Seen Babies," March 11, 1882, he gives us an array of facts as proofs of this seeming movement in the South, which, when analyzed, will be found to be so many evidences merely of changes in the condition of the negro. He says:

Some millions of human beings who were slaves are now citizens. This is new or nothing. It means nothing to ecclesiastical and political John Jaspers. Such facts and their consequences one may see without being a minute ahead of time; will not see if a generation behind.

This item includes the abolition of slavery and the citizenship of the negro, and is a pregnant fact, constituting the very gist and essence of all the rest of his facts in proof. We shall devote our whole attention to this one item, as the remaining are mere opinions of Dr. Haygood, which we can not accept for facts and are not relevant to any thing save the changed condition of the negro.

The freedom and citizenship of the negro is indeed new, and will take the eye of more than man to estimate in its consequences. We remember well when and how they were accomplished. It was during the darkest hour of the civil war, when throughout the South every man had gone to camp, and there remained at home only the aged men and young boys, the women and children, in the midst of slaves which largely outnumbered them; it was then, in the blackness of that night when the flash of a hundred battle-fields were seen as lightning on the horizon, that President Lincoln issued the proclamation of emancipation. At that time the Northern army had just been thrown back at Chickahominy, Mary's Hill and at Rappahannock. He had hesitated and held up the matter under advisement; but when the time came to speak he uttered this ominous sentence:

I raise no objections against it on legal or constitutional grounds, for, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, I suppose I have the right to take any measure which may best subdue the enemy; nor do I urge objections of a moral nature in view of possible consequences of insurrection and of massacre. I view this matter as a practical war measure to be decided on according to the advantages or disadvantages it may offer to the suppression of the rebellion.

Then it was on the first day of January, 1863, he launched this thunderbolt to add the horrors of St. Domingo to those of war. It was about thirty years before this time that England had completed her work of emancipation in a way that added lustre to the Christian civilization of the nineteenth century. August 25, 1833-34, the Parliament of Great Britain passed the acts by which 770,280 slaves, which were in the West Indies, were made freemen; and, five years after, she abolished slavery in her East India possessions.

Twenty millions of pounds sterling were paid by her to indemnify the citizens of the West Indies for their losses, and all was accomplished with great agitation, but without shedding one drop of blood. But added to this, the English Parliament did not contemplate for ornament the placing of these emancipated slaves of the West and East Indies in the responsible position of legislators, and diluting the government by giving them the ballot. This calls up the second fact of this pregnant item, namely: the citizenship of these six millions of America. Immediately upon the close of the war these inert masses were put in position as legislators of the South; outnumbering the white citizens in many places, they by sheer numbers held the legislative and executive powers of the government. From this appalling fact in the new South the mind and sentiment of this Christian age and people draw back in horror. The negro reluctantly assumed the position which was offered him; but he had no such quarrel with his former owners and the people of the South as was supposed. He had to be led, taught and incited to various outrages upon the civil and personal rights of the South, by men who were the exponents of the rage of war in times of peace; but was found totally incapable of such base purposes and wholly indisposed to follow such counsels. The superiority of our people in times of peace, and the courage with which they resisted the war of the invasion, commanded the full respect of the colored man. We may clearly see in this that the remainder of man's wrath was restrained by God. It was in consequence of the passive conduct of the colored man, and his confessed inexperience in the work of government, that unprincipled white men have fastened upon the Southern States burdens of debts and corporate grants from which they can scarcely hope to get free in another generation.

This huge attempt of unnatural tyranny, of the placing of an African race in control over a race of Anglo-American people, failed through the utter incapacity of the negro for carrying it out, though he was sustained in power, and the white man was held in practical disability by the reconstruction delays and the whole force of the government; nor was this merely for a day or a month, but for years together after the war ended. This indeed is somewhat new; but not newer than that this spirit of freedom and Christian civilization should be complimented by some of our own people who shared the humiliation of this tyranny until it was broken by the violence of its own excess. The negro has fallen out of nearly all the assemblies of the government by the sheer force of his own inherent unfitness for such position in the presence of a more gifted race. But the value of the experiment we can not forget in making up the elements which constitute the "new South." Mr. Jones, of Nevada, has given us a summary of facts, from a Republican standpoint, which we are inclined to think is nearer the truth. In his speech on the Anti-Chinese Bill, March 9, 1882, he says of the servile race in the South:

Their presence is not a blessing to us, but an impediment in our way. The relations between the white and colored races are no nearer adjustment than they were years ago. He would prophesy that they would never be permitted to dominate any State of the South. The experiment to that end had been a dismal failure—a failure, not because we have not tried to make it succeed; but because laws, laws away above human laws, have placed the one race superior and far above the other; and upon the homogeneity of our race depends the progress of our institutions and everything on which we build our hopes.

We think Dr. Haygood is singularly unfortunate in his first proof-act of new life in the "new South." But how precious to the accusing conscience of the Northern emancipationists must be such apologetic words and comforting theories of divine Providence as are found in the doctor's "new South:" that on the whole the war was a good thing; that it has benefitted us politically, industrially, financially, socially and morally. How soothing such providential vindication when coming from a Southern man? No wonder the conscientious men of the North openly express their gratitude to him; but, as for ourselves, we wish these wretched spirits peace

"Nor further seek their merits to disclose,
Nor draw their frailties from their dread abode."

In conclusion the doctor says: "We have seen babies cry for the moon; and nurse said, 'Baby shall have the moon.'" But we have seen something worth two of that: Babies crying for milk—nice, intelligent babies—until they were quieted with sweet milk. I do not doubt that the president of Emory has "seen babies;" but we do wonder at that Jasper-like simplicity which does not realize that the milk is all around his own mouth. After this any one may see babies in Georgia. The doctor must not attempt, in the same simplicity, to palm off on the nation his opinions for facts, nor the new negro for a new South.

Kentucky Correspondence.

Kentucky is blooming. This is a balmy morning after a spring shower. The peach, plum and early flowers laden the atmosphere with their fragrance. The wheat-fields are green and luxuriant—possibly too forward if we should have late frosts. Never have we had such a prospect for bread. The fall was so favorable that our farmers sowed wheat to their hearts' content, and the mild winter kept it alive and growing. For the first time, in the recollection of this writer, in this latitude cattle have lived all winter without having grain fed to them. It has been a Southern winter in its type. We have no ice; at least, none in Southern Kentucky. Perhaps one-third of our farmers have ice-houses. These are regarded as one of the necessary out-buildings on all well-ordered farms, but useless this year. Alas for ice-cream, good milk and butter and cistern water, to say nothing of other delicacies. During a thunderstorm last week the lightning exhibited a strange freak in the yard of Bro. Orr, one of our members. It struck and shivered six black-locust trees, as he thinks, at one stroke, and what is more remarkable, the trees were on both sides of his house, but the house escaped without damage. He was at his barn under a shed at the time and was knocked down by the shock. No person was in the house. A little negro, who was in a cabin in the yard, was rendered insensible for two or three hours. These are the facts as taken from him. Was it possible for one thunder-bolt to do so much damage, or were the trees on opposite sides of the house struck at different times?

Jeff. C. Hite, a cousin of the James brothers, who are so noted in Missouri for their bold robberies, was arrested at his father's house, in this community, since my last communication, and taken back to Missouri and tried for being in the train robbery there last summer, confessed his guilt, and was sentenced to twenty-five years in the penitentiary. His arrest was a shock to our community, for few if any persons had a suspicion of his complicity with the robbers. He is very young, and this was, perhaps, his first offense. He was drawn into this fatal snare by his love of adventure. The grandfather of the James brothers was one of the hollest men that ever lived in Logan county. He would not even drink a glass of water without returning thanks to God. The boys were in the Confederate army, were outlawed at the close of the war under the reign of terror in Southwest Missouri, and, step by step, went on in their fearful but astonishing career. Gladly would they have returned to their homes, after the war-cloud lifted and rolled away, but they could not; and while the writer has no sympathy with crime, is not an apologist for it, yet he has often thought that if the same magnanimous course had been pursued in Missouri, that was in Kentucky, the name of the James brothers would never have been covered with obloquy.

Our Prof. Stark, of Logan Female College, has delivered a course of lectures on "Old English" before the Polytechnic Institute, at Louisville, which have been highly spoken of by the local press. The professor is at home in that field. He is a delegate to the General Conference, and I learn will lecture on the same topic at Nashville during his sojourn there.

Bro. Barnes, the evangelist, has been near us. He believes in the final perseverance of the saints. He states himself with a will: You may get drunk, lie, swear, and do many bad things; but, if once converted, God will bring you in among the saved at the last. About eighty per cent. of his work goes for nought so far as we can see. Our mutual friend, Dr. C., welcomed the evangelist to Bowling Green. His notice of Barnes' visit, contributed to the Central, is amusing. If you will pardon the allusion to the old political anecdote, we will agree "that he sorter shook that 'coon-skin and sorter didn't shake it." The evangelist is full of slang.

Bro. J. S. Keen has been assisting us in protracted meeting at this place. His ministrations were very refreshing. For four years his soul has enjoyed perfect rest. Jesus is his theme. He loves the Saviour with unusual tenderness of love. He is not a fanatic; but a well-balanced, strong, clear-headed orthodox Methodist preacher. His ministrations are mostly profitable to the church. Such a series of morning meetings I hardly ever saw before, so refreshing! so satisfying! Bro. Keen rarely ever talks about the doctrine, but rather about the experience of grace; rarely names sanctification, perfection and other terms used technically, but in every sermon shows what the Christian's privilege is, and calls to the enjoyment of that love which "casteth out all fear." A "sanctified man" is generally an object of suspicion and distrust; but a deeply spiritual Christian, uniformly consistent, whose light shines with a steady ray is loved and trusted. Whence the difference? There are varying theories about sanctification, and according to a man's faith such is he; but "pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father" gives such an exhibition of virtues and graces, that the enlightened common sense of men, without regard to church relationship or theories of religion, will accept it as genuine. The practical question is not, What does he believe? but, How does he live? The new birth is the new life. The babe in Christ has imparted to him all of the elements of Christian manhood, just as the rose-bud has within its calyx, petals, pistil and stamen, beauty and perfume, afterward to be brought out under the influence of the sunshine into a full-blown rose. Oh, that all Christians could realize that their normal state is one of bloom—full blossom! Bro. Keen states that a few weeks ago, in Hart county, Ky., he took an old lady, aged one hundred and five years, into the Methodist Church—the oldest person that has joined the church, I suppose, since the days of the apostles. The old lady is very feeble, in her dotage, confined to her bed and evidently "to the margin come." When asked whether she was a member of the church, she answered, like young people generally do, "Not yet." One hundred and five years, and still it was, "Not yet." But she desired to join the church and receive the sacrament, and the privileged pastor complied with her wishes.

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

Dr. Rosser's article on Church Evangelists is timely, and entitled to careful consideration. Through Southern Kentucky the Baptist pastors are as good evangelists as our own stationed preachers, but they have found it necessary, and a very successful method, too, for building up the waste places to send out special evangelists. When a preacher goes out of one revival into another he is always warm with revival fire, and will carry with him also the prestige of success. Evangelists are not usually superior preachers; are not, as a rule, well adapted to the pastorate. Few men can do all sorts of work equally well. I am for evangelists. The General Conference draws near. This parsonage is within the roar of cannon fired at the city of rocks. Of course where so many great guns shall be brought together, we will keep our ears attent.

Up this way it is thought by some that about three Bishops will be elected. Kentucky is not expecting another stroke of episcopal lightning until her revered Kavanaugh passes away. Men are not much talked of, because it is believed that Divine Providence will show whom he hath chosen.

On the negro question some of our self-constituted pilots are at sea. Few will take passage on their ships. Let us be true to ourselves, and not veering shuttlecocks, changed about by dominant air-currents. "Eight beats seven" in counting, as we all know, that might has often triumphed over right is so easy of proof that Darwin predicates of it his "survival of the fittest." But we love Uncle Ned notwithstanding the complexion of his skin; we acknowledge him to be our brother in black.

A very accomplished lady says the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE is one of the very best of the Advocate family; so say you all gentlemen of the staff. Good night.

VERNON.

Floods of Water and Floods of Grace

MR. EDITOR: The floods are upon us, and plantation after plantation is going or has gone under. Hundreds of acres of cane are [illegible] water. The east side of the B[illegible] Teche is about all gone. There may be perhaps two levees standing between this place and the bay; but if the water continues to rise at the present rate (four to six inches in twenty-four hours) no levee will be intact in the next forty-eight hours. It is really fearful to contemplate the ruin that must ensue. It will affect all business, all trades and callings, so that the outlook is indeed most gloomy. Men, who a few days since hoped to realize thousands, are now perhaps ruined beyond recovery. These times bring out the true character of men. In one we see the noble manhood to stand out in its beauty and strength; and in the other the reverse is presented, and one feels compassion for the poor creature that has no other God but self. When I look down I can see nothing to cheer or help me; but, when I lift the eye "unto the hills," whence cometh help, all is bright and encouraging, and, in the midst of the wreck of man's devices, plans and hopes, the cause of Christ and the church of our God seem to have been inspired with new life and holy zeal. God is drawing near to his people, and is ready to pour out a blessing if they will but extend the hands to receive it. There has been a steady revival influence progressing in the church ever since I reached home from Conference. The spirit seems to be urgently at work convicting of sin and converting to Christ, reclaiming the backslidden and building up the faithful. Congregations large; the male attendance about equal to the female, and often in the majority. The communion well attended; the prayer meeting increasing both in numbers and interest. The class meetings are seasons of refreshing from the Lord: they are largely attended. The spirit is present, and each meeting is more precious than the preceding. Men and women now pray in public; young and old stand up and confess Christ; tears fall, pride is uprooted, hearts are melted down, and souls have been born into the kingdom in the class-room. The Sunday-school is nearly doubled and is doing well; the children are being taught in the way of truth, and their voices sing the praises of God in a manner that would do you good to hear them. There is also a Sunday-School Mission Society, and the little things are at work in earnest. I am humbled God seems so near. I fear lest some impatience of the Master's tarrying, and pushing of self into the foreground, may wound the blessed Spirit. Never before has the preaching of the word to dying men so impressed me; the account that the preacher must render; and if unwise, impatient or unfaithful, he is indeed "of all men the most miserable." That the spirit of God is at work is certain. This was manifested at the last class meeting. An old man came into the room whom I had never seen and but once heard of. When he entered I was sure he was the man. I called upon him to pray, and it was indeed as though he was talking with God. His experience was rich, full, ripe, and "the trumpet gave no uncertain sound." It reminded me of the book of Isaiah; he seemed to read the glory of the Christian's reward and understand the text, as did Isaiah see and understand the glory and strength of Christ's kingdom. There was in his words or manner nothing of "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are." He seemed rather to take hold of the Saviour's hands, and say: "To whom shall we go, thou hast the words of eternal life." Being filled with the love of God he was patiently waiting when he should enter into his rest. He had been fifty years a member of the church. I will not soon forget his face nor cease to remember his words. God sent him to bear witness to his truth, that men might both see and hear that Christ "was the way, the truth and the life," and that filled with his love.

"Earth has no sorrow that God can not heal."

Thus it is that the Lord is working in our midst, and by his spirit leading men into the way of life. Bro. Reed was with me on last Sunday, and was much encouraged on the whole district.

Your brother in Christ,

T. K. SAINT LEROY.

The Floods—A Narrow Escape.

MR. EDITOR: Supposing that some would like to hear from us in this region of watery desolation I write. It would make this article too long to give a detailed description of all that came under my own observation. The levees broke Tuesday, the twenty-first instant, in twenty places at one time, during a most terrific storm about four o'clock, turning the water on the people so suddenly that none were able to get to high land before it reached their houses. Two of the breaks occurred in front of my house, about two hundred yards apart, each one about fifty feet wide and eight or nine feet of water. By the time I could see in the yard the water was seven or eight inches deep; by nine o'clock it was three feet deep; by twelve o'clock it was five feet deep. About one o'clock, after having sought in vain for help to save my family, and having torn off some of the planks of my house, and with an old dull saw and hatchet I had completed a boat to save our lives. Just after I had launched my boat a skiff was brought to our relief, which carried my family safely to the Goodrich Store, one mile above, which is two stories high, where, with about 200 white and colored people, mostly the latter, with dogs, mules, and cattle etc., they spent the rest of the day and until the next day about three o'clock. Thus was my family saved. I am now at one of my steward's, Bro. Burney, on high land, or, rather, on dry land. When I returned the next day to save my household things, clothing etc., I found the water up to my waist, our trunks all afloat, everything wet. My store-room was so flooded with water that I did not attempt to go in at all; lost all my provisions, nearly all my furniture and a great deal of clothing and bedding. My buggy was washed away and horse-feed of which I had a good supply. Really, at this time, I do not know what I have lost. My family are saved, for which I feel thankful to God.

I have never witnessed such thing before, although I have seen distressing scenes, yet nothing I compare with this. Houses were washed away; several persons were drowned, how many I do not know. All day, Tuesday, and until Thursday night, screaming perishing human beings could be heard and seen calling for help. There were very few boats to be had. On Wednesday the people of Lake Providence sent boats to the relief of the sufferers, also food, and again food on Friday and Saturday. A great many mules, horses, cows and hogs were drowned. These twenty breaks are embraced in the distance of five or six miles. What is to become of the people here I do not know. They were overflowed by a break in the levee last year and again this year. They are financially ruined. The Lecun Grove Church people are the sufferers principally. I fear that church will be almost totally blotted from existence. The house will probably be washed away. I do not know what the end will be. Really, a meager support for wife and children seems almost out of the question. My health is by no means good. There is nothing for me to engage in to make a living. Verily, it looks like suffering is very close at hand. But our trust is in God who will not fail us even in this extremity. Your brother in Christ,

H. O. WHITE.

Good Words.

How near to me, my God, thou art!
Felt in the throbbing of my heart
Nearer than my own self to me.
Nothing is real without thee.

Thou fillest my being's hidden spring;
Thou givest my wishes heavenward wings.
Live thy life, I breathe thy breath,
And in thy presence is no death!

—The best recipe for going through life in an exquisite way with beautiful manner, is to feel that everybody, no matter how rich or how poor, needs all the kindness they can get from others in the world.

—Inward goodness and benignity of spirit reflect a certain sweetness and serenity upon the very countenance and make it amiable and lovely, inspire the soul with a noble resolution and courage, and make it capable of enterprising and effecting the highest things.—Scougal.

—It is a great and marvellous thing to be a Christian, and God lays more stress on that than on the sacrament. For the Christian was not made for the sake of the sacrament, but the sacrament was instituted for the sake of the Christian.—Luther.

—When God has a great work for any one to do in this world, he usually gives him a peculiar training for it; and that training is just what no earthly friend would choose for him; and sometimes it is so long continued that there seems but little time left for work.—Mary Lyon.

—Let us serve God in the sunshine while he makes the sunshine. We shall then serve him better in the dark when he sends the darkness. It is sure to come. Only let our light be God's light, and our darkness God's darkness, and we shall be safe at home when the great nightfall comes.—F. W. Faber.

—Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom; freedom none but virtue; virtue none but knowledge; and neither freedom nor virtue has any vigor or immortal hope except in the principles of the Christian faith, and in the sanctions of the Christian religion.—President Quincy.

—Without earnestness no man is ever great, or does really great things. He may be the cleverest of men; he may be brilliant, entertaining, popular; but he will want weight. No soul-moving picture was ever painted that had not in its depth a shadow.—Peter Bayne.

—An idle word may be seemingly harmless in its utterance; but let it be fanned by passion, let it be fed with the fuel of misconception, of evil intention, of prejudice, and it will soon grow into a sweeping fire that will melt the chains of human friendship, that will burn to ashes many cherished hopes and blacken more fair names than one.—Charles A. Dickey.

THE RESURRECTION.

BY MRS. S. K. BRADFORD.

When Lord Lindsay was traveling in Egypt he found a mummy, the inscription on which showed that it was two thousand years old. Unwrapping it, he discovered in one of its hands a tiny root. He brought the root to England and planted it, when, lo! it bloomed and produced a lovely flower. The following stanzas were suggested by this interesting incident:

Two thousand years ago a flower
Bloomed lightly in a far-off land;
Two thousand years ago its seed
Was placed within a dead man's hand.

Before the Saviour came to earth,
That man had lived and loved and died,
And, even in that far-off time,
The flower had spread its perfume wide.

Suns rose and set, years came and went,
The dead had kept its treasure well;
Nations were born and turned to dust,
While life was hidden in that shell.

The shriveled hand is robbed at last,
The seed is buried in the earth;
When, lo! the life-long hidden there—
Into a glorious flower burst forth.

Just such a plant as that which grew
From such a seed when buried low;
Just such a flower in Egypt bloomed,
And died two thousand years ago.

And will not he who watched the seed,
And kept the life within the shell,
When those he loved are laid to rest,
Watch o'er their buried dust as well?

And will he not from 'neath the sod
Cause something glorious to arise?
Aye, though it sleep two thousand years,
Yet all that buried dust shall rise.

Just such a face as greets you now,
Just such an form as here we wear,
Except more glorious far will rise
To meet the Saviour in the air.

Then will I lay me down in peace,
When called to leave this vale of tears,
For—"in my flesh shall I see God"—
Even though I sleep two thousand years.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

Second Quarter—Lesson III.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1882.—MARK vi. 30-44.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread."—Psalms cxxxii. 15.

FEEDING THE FIVE THOUSAND.

Soon after the death of John the Baptist the twelve disciples returned from their tour of Galilee (a description of which we had in the first lesson of this quarter,) meeting Jesus probably at Capernaum. Very likely their return had been hastened by the awful death of John the Baptist. As usual, whenever Jesus returned from one of his circuits to his home in Capernaum, the people flocked to see him from all the villages around. So many came that Jesus and his disciples had not even time to eat. Wishing to avoid being the center of the popular excitement which the death of the great and popular prophet had created, and which we know, as a matter of fact, was so strong that the people looked upon all the subsequent troubles of Antipas and his wife as retributive justice; so, after listening to his disciples' account of what they had done and taught, he proposed a short respite for them. "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place and rest awhile," for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure to eat. So this departure to a desert place was on the weary disciples' account, that they might have a quiet place to eat. What a wonderful repast they were going to they could not have had the least conception. The words of this invitation, "rest awhile," are full of compassionate consideration. He knoweth our frame, but he limiteth the rest, to "awhile." That busy scene, when the disciples were waiting on the ranks of hundreds and fifties, handing the bread and fishes, and afterward gathering up the fragments, gives an idea of their rest. They departed into a desert place privately by ship; that is, they did not let the place of destination be known; but the lake being small, the people could see the course of the boat, and, running along the coast, managed to keep ahead of the boat, so that when the boat landed, lo! the crowd was there waiting to receive him. The Master was touched when he came out of the boat and saw much people there; he at once gave up, and, full of compassion for the multitude, began teaching them, because they were as sheep without a shepherd. The disciples were weary, and the day was slipping by, and no rest nor food yet, and with some impatience they came to the Master expostulating: "This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed; send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread, for they have nothing to eat." Give ye them to eat, replied the Master. The disciples answered a little impatiently: "Shall we go and buy two hundred penny worth of bread and give them to eat?" They had made a hasty calculation of the amount necessary to give every one a little, and no doubt it oversized their purse. They wished to show how unreasonable the demand he made of them was. "How many loaves have ye?" And when they had taken a look into their scanty larder they reported the entire stock on hand to be five loaves and two small fishes, not enough for one meal for themselves. This juventory Christ had taken in order that he might clear the way for a stupendous miracle. His command to arrange the guests in ranks on the grass must have struck the apostles as preposterous when they thought of their stock on hand. What a picture! The slopes were rich with the soft green of the spring grass, that simplest and most touching lesson of the care of God for all nature, on the beautiful sward at the base of the rocky hill the people were seated to receive from the hands of the Son of God this miraculous bread, emblematical of the soul's true food found only in himself. And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, just a double handful, he looked up to heaven and blessed and broke the loaves, and gave to his disciples to set before them, and the two fishes divided he among them all. Oh! the amazing increase of that blessing.

They did all eat, and were filled. These multitudes had come, taking no thought what they should eat or drink, but only anxious to hear the word of life, to seek the kingdom of heaven, and now their meaner things, according to the word of promise, are added to them. A supernatural increase, like the widow's oil, which increased not in the cruse, but as it was poured out. So spiritual graces increase, not by being kept together, but by being distributed. All explanations of this miraculous increase, which are not supernatural, are not edifying. We do not pretend to explain this miracle, which has no parallel outside of the Bible and nature.

The fragments show the abundant way in which God provides for us. Enough for all, and some to spare, but none to waste; so they were all gathered up. The number and the fragments show the magnitude of the work. A lesson of economy, which is consistent with the greatest liberality.

The lessons we are to learn are many, but the central truth is Christ, the bread of life, satisfying the hunger of the soul for love, pardon and immortality. He that gives the gospel to others only has the more for himself.

J. P. and the Superannuates.

MR. EDITOR: I have been no little surprised to see, from time to time, for the past fifteen years or more, some one proposing to change the present law of our church in regard to the claimants upon the "Conference fund" from a principle of "necessity" to one of "equity."

That word—equity—seems to be the hobby of all who propose changes, just as if, under our present law, there were some unjust prescriptions or prerogatives. Equity is placed in the extreme.

In law the term is used to express an action, not in accordance to the statute, but in accordance to the justice of the case and the conscience of the court. Hence the old maxim of the common law writers: "He that asks equity must be just."

If the law relating to the "Conference fund" is made a matter of justice, and not of grace or mercy, it seems to me that several things must be done which have not yet been suggested by any one on that side. 1. The claimant should have a given per cent. on all his unpaid claims, running through his itinerant career, whether eight or sixty years. 2. Those, and only those, who failed to pay as the claims became due should be required to pay to that fund. 3. A bachelor should receive his interest at the end of one year as well as the consumptive man with a family of eight or ten at the end of thirty years, although the old man with his large family may have not more than fifty dollars unpaid, and the bachelor may have five hundred dollars unpaid salary. This ignores all "necessity," and comes down to the just basis of business, "right between man and man."

It seems to me that the object of this law, as it now stands in our Discipline, is mercy, not equity. If not, there is a culpable dereliction on the part of the General Conference in failing to provide that it shall be paid in full. If it be made a matter of "equity," there must be such a provision. There could be no equity in saying a thing shall be done, and making no arrangement for the doing of it.

J. P. complains at the discriminating power vested in the Joint Board of Finance, on the ground that it relates "more to necessity than to equity," but proposes to retain that power in his proposed law, just as if equity were a thing to be bent and stretched around all sorts of conditions. Maybe if J. P. would study the "parable of the laborers" he would get some light on this question. It seems that he would give the man who comes in at the eleventh hour nothing, notwithstanding he leaves all, and goes to work in the vineyard.

J. P. says "there is a vast difference between need and equity." In law this is true, but in ethics we fail to see it. "I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat," not because he owed him meat, nor that it was justly due him, his right, his equal portion, his just desert, but because he needed it. "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in." While in law the stranger has no equitable claims upon me, in morals he has. In morals we must speak of equity as the performance of Christian duty. In this department of law it is unjust. See the judge and the widow—unequitable, to let others suffer when in our power to relieve them.

No arrangement can be in "equity" which would give to bounty and neglect want. Suppose J. P. had traveled twenty-five years, and had a family of seven small children, and J. M. had traveled thirty years, and had no one dependent on him, and that both were placed on the superannuated list, would he regard it an act of "equity" to give J. M. more than to himself? I would not.

We have as good a law as we can ever have, unless we have one that gets more money.

J. A. P.

That Report on Temperance.

MR. EDITOR: Bro. Featherstun is sorry that the Mississippi Conference has so far meddled with politics as to resolve, "That we consider it a compromise of religious character for any member of the church to sign a liquor petition, or vote for known liquor men for office." He says; "Such would do very well for our Yankee brethren, but we have thus far left politics out of our Conferences, and I hope we will continue to do so." Yes, brothers, we have left politics out of our Conferences, and we have also usually left religion out of our politics. We have been so very fearful of patterning after "our Yankee brethren" that we have gone to the other extreme, and voted for "avowed liquor men," and men who are known to lead immoral lives. A short time since I heard a leading member of the Methodist Church, say, "I have often had to hold my nose while casting my ballot, but have always voted the straight party ticket."

Our preachers are generally conservative men, and probably do not often vote for bad men, but they have been so much afraid of appearing to take part in politics that they have seen their members, year after year, vote as Christians should not, without so much as entering a protest against it. With party politics we ought to have less to do, but the pastor should counsel his flock to take their religion with them to the ballot box. If this is the duty of the individual pastor, surely there can be no impropriety in a Conference, of ministers and leading laymen, expressing its opinion to the entire church.

I am truly glad that our Conference asked for a Committee on Temperance, and that its report, as presented, was adopted. I will further say that it was adopted by a rising vote, without a single dissenting voice, and that, at the request of Dr. Parker, a resolution was added asking its immediate publication in the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

A MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE.

From the Work.

SEASHORE DISTRICT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: I have just completed my first round for this year. We had considerable rain and much high water during the quarter. I was put to no special inconvenience by it. This is a large but not a difficult district to travel; the roads are generally good. In many parts of the work we have large and appreciative audiences; they come from four or five to ten or fifteen miles to the quarterly meeting. We have almost every shading of piety among us. At one church they keep up a regular class meeting, prayer meeting and Sunday-school; though they live from two to seven miles from the church, only one or two families so near as three miles. They talk about religion when they visit each other. At another church they have the greatest difficulty in keeping the Sunday-school alive, though perhaps fifty or sixty children, under Methodist influence, are within half a mile of the church. I hear of no fireside religious talks, unless the preacher is present. Some of our people pay for the support of the gospel more than others in like conditions. Some small farmers pay ten, fifteen and twenty dollars annually. Other larger ones pay much less. One little shop-keeper, of very small means, manages to pay ten or twelve dollars a year. One large merchant manages to get off with less. Last year his fair promises led the over-sanguine stewards to hope for five dollars from him, but the last day showed they had just put him five dollars too high. Men in this district, with less means than this man, pay over one hundred dollars annually. Some people in this district walk five or six miles to church habitually; others, sound and well, without excuse, habitually remain at home, though they live within a quarter or half a mile of the church. One sister last year, on the best of terms with her pastor, lived within three hundred yards of the church, where he preached about thirty times, never has heard him preach. Another sister, living a mile away, old, feeble, and often unattended, never misses an appointment, rain or shine, night or day. There is a difference in people, and always will be. We must be very careful in judging, but we can say there are some strange forms of piety among us. The people here treat the preachers well. My last round was very satisfactory. I hope it may be turned to much profit. If it was not for the long periods away from the family this would be one of the most pleasant districts in the Conference to travel. The new railroad passing centrally through, tapping Red Creek mission on its northern border, will make it easier on the presiding elder. There is at this time much activity along the line of that road; they are working on it all the way from Gainesville to Meridian. It is to cross Pearl river about nine miles above Gainesville. It crosses Leaf river just below the mouth of Bonie.

T. S. WEST.

SPRING RIDGE, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The first Quarterly Conference for Spring Ridge circuit, Brookhaven district, Mississippi Conference, was held at Forest Hill, March 12-13. Bro. J. A. B. Jones, our presiding elder, was with us, and preached two sermons, both of which were good to edification. Every church in the circuit was represented in the Quarterly Conference. The stewards, with one exception, were all present.

On Sunday the congregation was large, and very attentive to the preaching of the word. As is the custom on such occasions, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered, during which a goodly number of members feasted upon Christ by faith in their souls while partaking of the emblems of his broken body and shed blood.

Thus far three class leaders have been appointed for this circuit, and in the future, if our members can be induced to attend, class meetings will be held by them in their respective congregations. We have five Sunday-schools on this circuit, all of which use Methodist literature, exclusively, and are in a prosperous condition. In two of our schools, and on more than one occasion, I have been informed, perfect lessons have been recited by all the scholars; not a single question missed by any member of the school. This is, indeed, very gratifying. Our members, and the people generally, are very kind to their pastor, but some of them are sadly in need of more heart religion.

M. CLAYTON CALLAWAY, P. C.

BYRAM, MISS., March 21, 1882.

COLFAX CIRCUIT, ALEXANDRIA DISTRICT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: We, in this our new field, Grant parish, are at work. You know it is quite youthful, though progressive. Our ecclesiastical life, though brief, has made its impressions, and, with experience of the past, we are struggling hard, in faith and prayer, for success in the near future. We have received nineteen members into the church; have three Sabbath-schools just started, though promising much in longevity. We have held our first Quarterly Conference. Our presiding elder was on time with his usual vigilance, looking after all the interest of the work. We have a comfortable home for the preacher, with everything necessary accompanying a rural life. The assessment was in anticipation of the preacher's wants.

We have before us the liquor traffic memorial, petitioning for a constitutional amendment. The ladies are signing a supplement, with an expression of their desire in regard to the great evil. We hope to do good work for the ADVOCATE this year. We particularly approve of your concluding the numerous articles in regard to episcopal elections. Would it not be in keeping with our custom of fasting and prayer before each Quarterly Conference communion to also observe a day of special fasting and prayer throughout the church for the General Conference?

S. H. WHATLEY.

MARCH 27, 1882.

WESTVILLE, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: Away off here, amid the magnificent pine forests that are just now attracting the attention of the lumber-dealing world, we are at work. Prayerfully, and with trust in God, we are striving to build up the Master's kingdom. And I thank God that there are some blessed men and women who encourage me to go on. There are many earnest, true Christians among my people, but some, alas! who follow the Master from afar, and some even who, Herod-like, are "vexing the church." Still, "by the grace of God, we are what we are," and, "by the grace of God," we will become better than we are. Dr. West, was at our Quarterly Conference, and did some good work. In conclusion I will say my work is pleasant, my people kind, and my hopes of God's blessing upon us very bright. I enjoy many pleasant and profitable hours with the young Baptist minister, who labors in the same territory with myself. My rule for judging the benefit derived from the ADVOCATE is that those families who read it seem to enjoy most religion.

Yours, M. A. BELL.

MY REPORT.

MR. EDITOR: As I have finished canvassing the county of Leake as colporteur for the Southwestern Bible Society, I send you my report to publish if you think it necessary. I wish to thank the citizens of the county for their kindness to me and my mule. I have spent many pleasant evenings with those kind people after a day of travel. My work was as follows: families visited, 2,111; destitute families found, 694; supplied, 459; left destitute, 235; sold, 1,266 volumes, worth $300 43; donated, 41 Bibles, 204 Testaments and 6 portions, worth $21.

Obituaries.

CARRADINE.—Died in Vicksburg, Miss., March 1, 1882, LAURA G., wife of Rev. B. Carradine, in the thirtieth year of her age.

The inevitable destroyer, death, has entered that once happy home and borne away in triumph their fairest jewel—the gentle, loving wife and fond, devoted mother. Death is the inevitable end of us all. "God rules in a mysterious way," and although dark and unfathomable it appears, yet he knows best. He has taken from us, in the beauty of true womanhood our dear friend and beloved sister. Only two short months was the light of her Christian spirit permitted to shine around us; yet in that brief space of time we learned to love her. Her young life was cut short. The tender vine was broken and lay withering on the ground. Her voice is now hushed in the slumber of death. Her sweet smiles that she retained even in death, are forever buried from our sight. To her husband she was always a source of joy and pride. She aided and assisted him in his work. She sympathized with him in his sorrows. When tired and weary he sank upon the couch to rest, it was her hand that smoothed his fevered brow, and her voice that lulled him to calm repose. Her whole soul was wrapped up in doing good. As a wife she was loving and faithful; as a mother she was kind and devoted. Modest and retiring in disposition, she preferred the pleasures of the home circle to the amusements of the world outside. She was an example to the old as well as young. She lived and died in Christ. What a sweet and divine assurance of faith are the words she uttered before she sank into that last sleep: "If I die in unconsciousness, I die in Jesus." Her whole soul was dedicated to the service of her God. She died as she lived. Such was her Christian spirit, that none knew her but to love her. But she has been borne on angels' wings to realms of light—borne to that home where sorrows never come, where angels' voices sound the praises of heavenly joys, and angel fingers touch the golden harps; and, as we plant fresh flowers over her grave, and water them with our tears, our prayers will ascend to the throne on high that God may send comfort and resignation to her sorrowing husband, and four little children so suddenly bereft of a mother's care, and enable them to say, in the fullness of their hearts: "We only yield thee what is thine. Thy will be done."

A FRIEND.

This congregation has heard with deep regret of the decease of Mrs. Laura B. Carradine, wife of our late pastor, who had endeared herself to this church and community by her godly walk and conversation, exhibiting in her traits of mind and character those virtues which make up the highest type of the true Christian woman.

Resolved, That we tender to our bereaved brother our words of love and sympathy in his great affliction. May that cup of consolation which he pours out for others, be his in double measure in this his hour of sorrow. We share his grief, but we also join with him in the bright hope of reunion hereafter, where friendships never rust and sorrows never come.

Adopted by Church Conference, Crystal Springs, March 5, 1882.

J. B. FERGUSSON, Sec.

YOUNGBLOOD.—SISTER MISSOURI YOUNGBLOOD was born at Springfield, Mo., in 1844. Her maiden name was McGinty. Losing her mother in childhood, she came to Yazoo City, Miss., with her father and an only sister who survives to mourn the untimely death of one so near and dear. On January 6, 1874, she was married to Mr. Joseph Youngblood, of Hinds county, Miss. She was a devoted and faithful wife, making the little home happy as a trustful, industrious and Christian wife alone can. She united with our Methodist Church here, at Bolton, Miss., about two years ago, under the ministry of Rev. Benjamin Jones. Through her godly example and wise words of encouragement she first induced her husband to attend the Sunday-school and Bible class, and afterward had the great happiness of seeing him bowing at our altar, assuming the vows of church membership and partaking of the blessed emblems of communion. She was not long spared to participate here in this delightful co-working. But we trust that eternity will witness the full resultant of that inter-communion established here, on the shores of Time. She delighted in the services of the sanctuary—rarely absent from preaching, prayer meeting or Sunday-school, seeking as her health permitted attendance. Amid the weariness and pain of a sickness of some months (with intervals of ease and comparative health) one of her chief regrets seemed to be the deprivation of the means of grace. "Will I never get to hear another sermon?" still lingers in the ears of some who visited her a few weeks before her death. She died seemed far from the gates of death, but appeared to have a presentiment of approaching dissolution. She died within a day or two after her friends began to think her seriously ill. The great regret of many is that they knew not of her sickness in time to minister to her. The shock, the sudden announcement of her death, caused to nearly every one in our little town, testified to the esteem in which she was generally held. She passed over the river, February 25, 1882, expecting to meet her Saviour, and to enjoy the rest of the mansions prepared. The home down here is desolate; the cemetery holds the precious dust; the spirit has flown away to God who gave it, and we may meet her there.

J. P. DRAKE.

DOWNING.—Died at Raymond, March 5, 1882, at 12 M., MRS. ALICE MARIA DOWNING. She was the second child of Mr. James L. and Mrs. Philomia Tynes, now of Hinds county, Miss. Our friend was born in Pike county, Miss., March 3, 1850. Thus she lacked three days of reaching the age of thirty-two years—in the midst of life! Joining the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, about the age of ten, her childhood and youth were spent in the service of the Master. As an obedient, loving daughter she exemplified the doctrine of early piety, ripening into rich fruitage of maturer life. She seems to have experienced the full joy of pardoned sin first in the year 1868, and under the ministry of our now stricken brother, Dr. Caulfield. Coming home to mother and dear ones soon afterward she rejoiced in possessing "that pearl of great price." As she told to some of the neighbors round what a dear Saviour she had found, they tell how her beautifully amiable face was lit up "as if it had been an angel's." The lines of grace continued there clearly marked through life. Quiet and unobtrusive, almost to reserve; her character yet commended itself to all beholders as that of a true Christian. But specially in the near relations of family life was she esteemed as a jewel of rare value. The letters she would write home always breathed the warm desire to have her dear ones fully committed to that service in which she found such freedom and peace. Her earnest words will doubtless now reverberate through memory's corridors, and their echoes produce answers to prayers long since audited in heaven.

On the ninth of February, 1870, she was happily married to Mr. William M. Downing, of Raymond. Though sickness, to all others apparently mortal, had wasted her frame for about six months, and for three months she had not been able to rise from her bed of affliction, yet the fond husband would not allow the thought of separation till the pure spirit actually winged its way upward—homeward.

SPRIGGS.—Departed this life of typhoid pneumonia, Miss MARY J. SPRIGGS, on the twenty-eight of November, 1881, near the city of Vicksburg, Miss. We called her lovingly, "Josie," and she was a lovable and beautiful character. She was about fourteen years of age. Her grandparents were residents of Wisconsin. Her stepfather and her dear mother were very tender and loving toward her, and she was a dutiful and truly Christian young woman. She was the light and joy of her mother's home and heart. Her death has left a cloud of darkness in that home that can be felt. But why sit sad and mournful in the darkness. Dear Josie has been transplanted to bloom forever in heaven. There she will meet her relations who have gone before, who have been watching and waiting for her. Her young heart was alive with trust and hope in Christ, and she felt a clear assurance that she would be saved through the "blood of the Lamb," and rest in heaven. One child less on earth: one more in heaven. So the Lord has many ways to wean our hearts from this poor, unsatisfying world. To me, to all who knew dear Josie, the world seems poorer for her absence from it. Her departure has left a shadow on all our hearts; but faith bids us be hopeful and rejoice in the triumph of her glad soul in gaining the skies. Her Sabbath-school was her delight. She was a member of our church, and a promising, sweet-spirited disciple of the Great Teacher. We may hope for eternal life if we but live as she did, and die as she died. To her it was Christ to live, and to die a great gain.

The solemn silence and deep impression that followed upon the announcement that dear Josie was dead, told more eloquently than words can tell how she loved her and how we grieved over her loss. We sincerely sympathize with the bereaved ones. Had was the parting; joyous will be the meeting, "the sweet by and by." Till then, dear Josie, farewell!

MRS. M. [illegible]

HOWELL.—Died, at the residence of her father, J. B. Howell, Esq., in Jackson parish, La., February 24, 1882, Miss DELILAH F. HOWELL. She was in Holmes county, Miss., October 29, 1841. Joined church in Mississippi, in August, 1857, under ministry of Rev. Dr. Thomas Ward. Removed to Louisiana, in 1868, and attached herself to this church here at her first opportunity in 1872. Delilah was known to the writer for several years, two of which she was in his pastoral charge. She was a faithful attendant on all the ordinances of the church, and always seemed full of zeal for God and in communion with him. She had an earnest desire for religious knowledge and loved to converse on the conversation. There are not many openings for this in this section; but when one offered, she was ever found doing what she could. Her death was occasioned by this disposition. A neighbor had died during a time of sickness with measles in his house for want of help, and she, though never having had the disease, went in a spirit of self-sacrifice to nurse them, and soon after died of the same. The writer can never forget how for weary weeks she labored day and night in his own family so affectionately and tenderly she cared for the sick boy, whom God took to himself. God very properly commemorates the noble deeds of great men and women; but heroic deeds are done and noble lives are lived, oftimes, of which the busy world never hears. Such a life was hers. Her spirit and, as far as possible, her deeds of love were here; and for the sake of Christ! She lived to him, and is not only delivered from all the mortal life, but also glorying in the treasure laid up in heaven. May her bereaved relatives and friends have as bright hope in death.

BLAKENEY.—Died, March 8, 1882, at the residence, near Nicholson's Store, Choctaw county, Ala., Mrs. ISABELLA BLAKENEY, aged about 60 years. She was born in Chesterfield district, S. C., while yet young her widowed mother emigrated and settled in Green county, Miss., where in after years she was married to John G. Blakeney. Her maiden name was McLendon. She was the mother of eleven children, all of whom (except the youngest, the writer) are dead. Five of them died in infancy or early childhood. Her husband died in January, 1870, and she returned to the home of her childhood, where she died. In early life she made a profession of religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and lived a consistent member of it. In BURIAL OF JESUS.

Now to the tomb
Thyself art come,
Who, for us death enduring,
Didst bear the curse for sin,
Eternal life procuring.

Death wrought his will
In thee, and still
Our life in thee reposes,
And weak mortals now
The grave thy form incloses.

Yet, in the grave,
Thy God shall save
Thee, from corruption seeing;
And soon be shown thy power
From death thy body freeing.

Yes, and 'tis last,
When time is past,
Thy from the grave thou'lt waken;
And why should dew our hearts
With fear of it be shaken?

Nay, we will there
Triumphant appear,
In peace and hope recline us;
Then, through thy death, to thee
From death and grave will join us.

Ye, whom in chains
The world detains,
May all corruption tremble:
Through Christ, our moulder'd flesh
His body shall resemble.

No—nothing's lost,
Safe is our trust,
The very dust that's sleeping,
For glory purified,
Is all above the earth's safe-keeping.

Then let the grave
That bodies have,
No matter longing grieves us
The thinking on thy grave
From all such care relieves us.

Notes of Life.

BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The Flint River Circuit, to which I was appointed in 1818, was a large one. Our circuits then were large. I was sent. It extended south to Huntsville, and north to Winchester, Tenn., with the intervening and surrounding country. It lay in a fertile and beautiful section, and was rapidly filling up with a wealthy and intelligent population. It was bounded on the east by a long, unbroken range of mountains, dividing the waters of Tennessee and the Coosa Rivers, and constituting one of the most picturesque and productive valleys of the Western world. It was a delightful country, and was occupied by worthy people. Its contiguity to my father's gave me the pleasure of visiting home more frequently. The only drawback was, that being in general charge the exercise of the discipline upon its violators now devolved upon me. Several instances soon occurred the first at Flint Springs ground, of preaching and dismissing the congregation. I proceeded to ask for the class-leader and the class paper, to hold an after-meeting with closed doors, as usual. The leader suggested that a certain brother present had been intoxicated, and a trial was needed. The membership was the largest in the circuit all were present. A profound silence ensued, while every head was bowed in grief and sympathy. The accused was a middle aged, an industrious and successful young planter, who owned a good little farm, and was a worthy and respected. His wife, with several small children, was there. She was a cheerful, tidy, loving wife, and an earnest Christian. The sun rarely ever shone on a happier household. Their friends, on both sides, and nearly all their kin, were present, for the family were Methodists, and were the honored of the county as citizens and Christians. The erring brother responded to the call of his name, pleaded guilty to the charge, and, in subdued tones, submitted his case. I read the rule—"Drunkenness is "a crime expressly forbidden!" I was in trouble—all were troubled. Must he be expelled? He was a young convert, and expulsion and degradation likely involved ruin. I began by asking him.

"Why, my brother, have you brought yourself and us into this fix? Have you any explanation to give for your conduct? When, where, how did it happen?"

Then the class paper trembled in my hand as his wife's head sunk down as if she was crushed, and I broke down. Then he raised his head a little, and the great scalding tears were coursing down his honest, candid face, said in a way, in tones interrupted by emotion too strong to be wholly expressed in words:

"I didn't intend it, brother. It wasn't in a doggery; my merchant I needed something—it was cold—thought it now suppose it was raw, risky or brandy. I never thought it might turn my head so. Never was drunk before. Can't help it now; it's out, and I am ruined."

Here he broke down, and his poor wife brought a low, long wail, like a mourning dirge. We all broke down.

"No, no, brother," I said; "can't it be quit?"

"Quit!" he replied. "I have quit. I suppose you must turn me out—suppose you ought to—but do as you may, I never will taste the thing again; never, so help me God."

And then his wife shouted, and the younger child climbed into his father's lap and the youngest nestled fondly in it's mother's bosom. The old members took hands and blessed God, and the young pastor thought he saw day break.

In conclusion, I proposed that if he was truly penitent, and would then and there join me in a solemn pledge never to use intoxicating liquors again, unless as medicine, we would forgive him, and say nothing more about it. He did this at once; the members agreed to it, and this was the first temperance society I formed. I often heard of him afterward, and learned he had kept his vow, as I have tried to keep mine since 1818. Methodism meant temperance then. The class-leader prayed, all left happy, and at a camp-meeting held there that summer more than 120 professed religion and joined the church. That trial did good. But scarcely had I ceased to thank God and congratulate myself on the happy ending of this affair before it was whispered in my ear by a trusty old tried class-leader, the recording steward residing in a distant section of my work—old Brother S.—that a similar, but far more serious case had occurred in his class. The greater importance of this affair arose from the fact that the accused was the best educated and most respected, and more generally known than any other local minister in the community. He was a native of Scotland—was thoroughly educated in Edinburg for the ministry of the National Church, and came to the United States at the call of his brethren to fill an important position. He landed, I believe, in Virginia where he entered upon the duties of his vocation. His qualifications for the position soon became evident, and his success was assured. New scenes and associations were, after a short period, followed by his marriage to an excellent lady, a Methodist, and a member of an intelligent and highly respected family. Thus thrown into immediate contact with a large and devoted body of Christians and ministers holding Arminian sentiments, he awoke to the fact that he was obliged to examine a creed which, by the number and character of its adherents, confronted and antagonized his own.

Quietly, prayerfully, and unknown to others, the process began. It presently became a serious matter. He began it, not doubting it would end in confirming his long cherished Calvinistic opinions, and furnish him additional arguments against Wesleyan theology. What was his suprise to find, as he cautiously and slowly proceeded, to find himself surrendering and receding, step after step, from points he had regarded as impregnable, until, to his amazement, his conscience compelled him to abandon the strongholds of unconditional election, and accept the system of provisional universal salvation. There was no public controversy going on between the opposing advocates of the two creeds, but in the solitude of his library he critically, as a scholar, marked, weighed, and unwardly digested the subject, determined to follow his matured and conscientious convictions wherever they might lead. The result of this mental struggle was his conversion to Methodist doctrines. Arminius, Episcopius, Wesley and Fletcher, in their explanation of the word of God, triumphed over Augustine, Knox, and Calvin, and his mind was disenthralled and emancipated from the "Horrible decree." It followed, as a matter of course, that as his investigation had been honest this action was prompt. He candidly reported his change, was "relieved," without censure, received and recognized as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and enjoyed the confidence of both churches and of the whole community. In after years his Virginia friends induced him to remove with them to the West, and open a first-class academy, where I found him, in 1818, within the bounds of my work. He had become a patriarch in piety, age, and bearing. His school and field conducted by Rev. Thomas B. Craighead, near Nashville, Tenn., 120 miles apart, were regarded as the best classical academies in all their respective regions. In many respects they were alike—both were then far advanced in life, had educated a large number of the most prominent members of the community; both had found it necessary to revise their creeds and eliminate therefrom the ultra Calvinistic features of the Westminster Confession; the former had found a congenial haven in Methodism, while the latter, I believe, did not change his church relation. They were alike respected for their piety, learning, and usefulness.

Such was the venerable man who was reported by the class-leader and lifelong friend as having been intoxicated, and who desired to see me and the leader about it. We went immediately and found him in bed; silent and sorrow prevailed in the house. His aged and devoted wife and their children kept their rooms—they were grief-stricken and stunned; they could not talk about it; could see no one. Our visit unlocked the fountain, and for awhile his tears poured forth as from an overflowing heart. We, too, sat with bowed heads, and could not talk, while we cried as if over a dying father. At last he abruptly broke the silence, in substance saying to me:

"I have disgraced the church—have been intoxicated—you must try and expel me. Nothing shorts of this will do."

The facts turned out to be these: He was invited to celebrate the rites of matrimony between a couple who were the children of two of his friends. When the time came the weather had become intensely cold, the roads frozen, and the distance was greater than he had supposed. Withal, he was an inexperienced horse-back rider; was old, feeble, and not acquainted with the road. Of course he lost his way, was belated, and after hiring a negro to guide him, arrived at the place several hours behind time. When he got there he was so stiff and cold that he had to be taken down and carried into the house. To restore him they gave him something, assuring him it would revive him without hurting him. He took it, sat by the fire awhile, and found his head in a whirl.

"Why, everything is turning round—am I drunk?" he exclaimed.

The company assembled was a large, wealthy, and aristocratic one, many of whom he had educated, and all revered him: they knew his Scotch integrity and Christian purity of life, and while he wept in repenting, "I must be drunk," etc., they replied, "No, it is vertigo—the cold and fatigue followed by a hot fire." But this did not soothe his feelings. He, however, performed the ceremony, and, after a night's rest, went home. Now he demanded of me, as his pastor, a trial and full punishment. He had dismissed his school in his paroxysm of mortified grief, had proclaimed his fall, and now the church must vindicate her rules by his arrest, trial, and expulsion. It was useless to talk to him. So I called a committee, and he was suspended three months. He protested against the leniency of the sentence, and sent me his certificates of ordination, but finally submitted. The time expired; it was on my preaching-day there. I asked him to take my place. The whole region attended, and such a sermon and such a time as we all had is rarely witnessed. He felt, to rise higher in public esteem, and has long since gone where misfortunes and temptations, like sin and sorrow, are forever unknown.

MISSIONARY.

Here Martyn lies! In manhood's early bloom
The Christian hero found a pagan tomb.
Religion, sorrowing o'er her favorite son,
Points to the glorious trophies which he won:
Eternal trophies, ring with slaughter red,
Not studded with tears by hopeless captives shed,
But trophies of the cross; for that dear name
Through every form of danger, death and shame,
Onward he journeyed to a bolder shore,
Where danger, death, and shame are known no more.

—[Macaulay's tribute to Henry Martyn.]

JAPAN.—An editorial in a Tokio paper estimates the martyrs to Christianity at 280,000. While opposed to Christianity, the writer thinks it can not be put down by force, and that the Government should tolerate it, repeal its laws against it, which are not enforced, and, a day or two the missionaries commenced again, a strong religious interest sprung up, and at the end of nine weeks several hundred conversions are reported.

—The native Christians of the Madura mission of the American Board have dedicated a church edifice built with stones from the ruins of a heathen temple. Even the heathen aided to some extent in its erection.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—A beautiful baptismal font of fine mottled blue Rutland marble has been placed in the First Church, Schenectady, N. Y., as a fitting memorial to the late Taylor Lewis, LL. D. The font is four feet high; the shaft is ornamented by eight stalks of lilies bound by two fillets. Beneath is the legend, "In Memoriam, Taylor Lewis, LL. D. Ab Amicis Multis. In Pacem Mai 11, 1877. Ætat 77." Around the bowl is cut, in raised and polished letters: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." On the top of the bowl is his favorite text, in Hebrew, from Job 19: 25: "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

—The latest reports of the State Church of Prussia indicate a steady increase in the number of theological students. In 1876 the number of students was 559; in 1881 it rose to 996. In the whole empire it was, in 1870, 1,536; last year, 2,381. The universities of Leipsic, Halle and Berlin received the largest number of these ministerial candidates. The deficiency in candidates is therefore rapidly growing less. In 1880 some thirty-eight churches were erected and many restored. The receipts from official collections were $188,272, and bequests amounted to $364,562. There are about 6,600 clerical positions.

—The summaries of the Roman Catholic Church for the United States show that in 1881 it had 75 prelates, an increase of 6; 6,366 priests, a decrease of 64; 1,562 ecclesiastical students, an increase of 362; 5,955 churches, an increase of 119; 1,145 chapels, an increase of 181; 1,568 stations, decrease 155; 79 colleges, 513 academies, 2,476 parochial schools, with 399,188 scholars, a falling off of 24,195; 218 asylums, 126 hospitals; and 6,370,588 Catholic population, gain of about 3,500.

—Trinity Church of New York has taken steps for the erection of a sanitarium, at Islip, L. I., on an extensive scale. Mr. William Nicoll has given three acres of land for bathing purposes, and Trinity Church has purchased several acres adjoining the church, and a dozen or more cottages will be erected. It is proposed to expend not less than $50,000.

—Dr. Joseph Parker's City Temple, London, has adopted the plan of administering the sacrament on a week night, to meet the convenience of worshipers who are unable to stay to the ordinance on Sunday evenings, and do not like the custom of holding it in the morning. The first service was held on a recent Monday evening, and was well attended.

—The National Bible Society of Scotland have placed in the hands of Dr. Somerville, at present on an evangelistic tour in Germany, 50,000 copies of portions of the New Testament for gratuitous distribution. Dr. Somerville declares that the supply is considerably smaller than the demand.

—The Reformed Episcopal Church has been in existence eight years, beginning with nine clergymen, including Bishop Cummins and twenty laymen. It now has 119 clergymen and about 7,000 communicants. It has church property valued at $915,000 exclusive of incumbrances.

—The Rev. M. J. O'Farrell, of New York City, has been made the first Bishop of Trenton, N. J., by the Pope; and the Rev. W. M. Wigger, of Madison, N. J., becomes Bishop of Newark, in succession to Bishop Corrigan, now coadjutor of Cardinal McCloskey.

—In nine months the missionaries of the American Sunday-school Union have organized 1,597 new Sunday-schools, with 7,190 teachers and 58,279 scholars—a larger number than in all the preceding years.

—The "expiatory" church, to be built on the spot where the late Emperor of Russia was slain, is to be raised by subscriptions from the whole empire. St. Petersburg alone has paid near $50,000.

—The English Baptist Hand-book for 1882 states that thirteen churches and thirty-seven chapels were erected last year. Eighty-six chapels were enlarged and chapel sittings augmented by 24,000. The increase in members was 5,700.

—After sixteen years' existence the National Sunday-School Teacher merges itself with the Sunday-School Times, its editor, Mr. Hazard, joining the editorial staff of the Times.

—Dr. Jessup reports quite a revival of religion in the Greek Church of Beirut, resulting from the translated sermons of Mr. Moody, issued by the Beirut press.

—Mrs. Clara M. Bisbee was ordained pastor of the Free Church at Dorchester, Mass., February 28, Prof. U. C. Everett, of Harvard, preaching the sermon.

—A William Morley Punshon memorial chapel is to be built in Colwyn Bay, Wales, at a cost of $30,000. The pulpit is to be of Italian marble, and presented by Wesleyan ministers.

—The total membership of the Lutheran Church in this country, as stated in the "Lutheran Calendar" for 1882, is 783,302—a gain in the past year of 37,891.

—By a vote of the faculty of Chicago Theological Seminary, the Revised New Testament will hereafter be used in the religious exercises of that institution.

—The Episcopal Church of this country raised last year $220,593 for domestic missions, and $91,205 for foreign missions.

—The Waldensians in Italy report a net gain during the year past of 3 4 members.

—The number of church members in Madagascar has increased in ten years from 37,113 to 71,585.

AN EASTER HYMN.

BY THOMAS BLACKBURN.

Awake, thou wintry earth—
Fling off thy sadness!
Fair vernal flowers, laugh forth
Your ancient gladness!
Christ is risen!

Wave, woods, your blossoms all—
Grim death is dead!
Ye weeping funeral trees
Lift up your head!
Christ is risen!

All is fresh and new,
Full of spring and light;
Wintry heart, why wear'st the hue
Of sleep and night?
Christ is risen!

Leave thy cares beneath,
Leave thy worldly love!
Begin the better life
With God above!
Christ is risen!

Secret of the Ball of Wool.

It was near Katie's birthday, and she was anticipating a very happy time, when her mother took sick, and when she partially recovered, Katie's father thought it necessary to travel. Accordingly preparations were made for her mother, father, and sister Ethel to go to Florence to remain perhaps several months. They, having to leave Katie behind, sent her to her Aunt Mary in the country to remain until they returned. After they had been absent several weeks, a letter came addressed to "Miss Katherine Brownlee," written in her mother's delicate hand. Her mother said that on her birthday she would receive a box from Florence, containing her birthday presents. She asked her if she could trust her as to what her mother should send her. After tea, assisted by Aunt Mary, Katie wrote a little letter to her mother, telling her she could trust her to get her birthday present. The wonderful day at last came. In the evening Katie was to have a party. It seemed as if the morning would never end. A carpenter was sent for from the neighboring village to fix the tables out under the trees, and to make two swings out in the orchard, for the amusement of the children. The evening at last came. A great many little girls came, all dressed in white dresses, and blue and pink sashes. When they were tired of playing games, Aunt Mary called them to the elegant tables, arranged under the shady trees. The tables were loaded with delicious fruit, splendid cakes, ice cream, and nearly everything good. After supper the little girls went away, and left Katie on the fence waiting for the cart they had sent to the depot for the box, containing the presents from Florence. At last the sound of wheels was heard, and Katie jumping from her perch, ran out of the gate to meet the cart. After what seemed an age to Katie, the box was brought into the house and opened. It contained a beautiful gold ring from sister Ethel, a lovely locket from papa, and also another small box, written on the back, "From mother to her trustful little girl." It was opened, but exhibited to Katie's expectant eyes, nothing but a ball of knitting wool. It also contained a letter from her mother, telling her she would come home in a few weeks, and wished her to knit her father a pair of socks by the time she returned. Katie's eyes filled with tears; she said mother was so mean to treat her so. She had trusted her, and now she had sent her nothing but a ball of wool. Katie ran out of the house down by the brook where she had so often sat with her Aunt Mary. She cried and cried until she could not possibly get up another sob. At last she fell asleep. The sun was just sinking in the west when she awoke, and there was Aunt Mary standing over her. Oh! Aunty, why did mamma treat me so, said Katie; her tears beginning to flow afresh. I don't know, said her Aunt, but I know that your mother did not intend to disappoint you? I wonder what is the secret of the ball of wool. Do you really think there is some secret about it, said Katie, drying her eyes. There certainly is some secret about it, said she. I advise you to go right to work and knit the socks, and it will all come right. Arriving at home, Katie immediately set to work to knit the socks. Late every night she sat up knitting away while Aunt Mary sewed. Late one night while she sat working, she noticed a cover of a block of wood sticking out of the ball of thread. Aunty said: Katie I believe this thread is wound on a block of wood; see the corner out here. Let me see my dear, said Aunt Mary. That is not a block of wood Katie, it looks more like a box. Aunt Mary took the knitting, and commenced unwinding the thread. "We will find out the secret to-night," and she unwound the thread careless of knots or snarls. It proved to be a beautiful little box, which she laid on the table. Being opened it contained the loveliest little watch and chain she had ever seen. On the cover was written in large letters, "From mother to her trustful little girl." So you see said Aunt Mary if you had not knit the socks perhaps you would never have possessed this beautiful watch and chain which lies before us. F. V.

More Help for Mexico.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I am a little boy twelve years old. My mother takes your paper. We are all glad when it comes. I like to read it, especially the young people's corner. I go to Sunday-school. We have a good school. There are about sixty scholars and eleven teachers in attendance. Our pastor is there every Sunday, and always makes remarks to us on the lesson. We were very sad when we had to give up our preacher last year. But we are learning to love our new pastor very much. I am writing to you to let Annie and Olive know that I want to help in their plan of building a church in Mexico. I am going to pick strawberries to make the money. I have a little brother, and he says he will give something too. As I am afraid you will think my letter too long, I will close. You may expect my contribution soon. We want you to be certain to come to our camp-meeting.

From your little friend,

WALTER S. FIELD.

CRYSTAL SPRINGS, MISS., March 27, 1882.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: Papa has been taking your paper for years, and we would not do without it for twice its cost in money. We saw a letter in the ADVOCATE from Annie and Olive Secrest, wanting the little folks of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, to help them raise money enough to build a church in Mexico. We will try to help them a little, and will send the money to you this fall. We will have only a small amount to give, but hope that will be acceptable. We are going to school now, and like our teacher very much, and are studying hard to improve our time. We hope this will not find its way to the waste basket, as it is our first attempt. Your little friends.

The Animal Kingdom.

Keepers and trainers of elephants often lie down on the ground and let the high fellows step right over them; they know the elephants will pick their way carefully over the prostrate forms, never so much as touching them. Yet the mighty creatures can brush a man out of existence as easily as a man can brush away a fly. And what delicate tastes they have—delighted with strawberries, gum-drops, or any little dainty of that kind. They are fond of bright colors, too, and travelers tell wonderful tales of seeing elephants gather flowers with the greatest care, and smell them, apparently with the keenest pleasure.—Jack in the Pulpit, St. Nicholas.

A traveling showman with five monkeys and a goat was recently murdered near Sattara, his troupe being killed with the exception of one monkey, which ran up a tree and watched. When all was quiet the monkey ran off to the "patel," of the nearest village, and made him understand by speeches and signs that something was wrong, and led him to the place where his master was buried. Thus the murder was discovered. The monkey is now kept for the identification of the assassins, a plan which recalls the time-honored history of the dog of Montargis.—London Graphic.

That our mocking-bird, in his native haunts in the South, surpasses any bird in the world in compass, variety and execution is highly probable. Bring our birds together as they are brought together in England, all our shy wood-birds—like the hermit thrush, the veery, the winter wren, the wood wagtail, the water wag-tail, the many warblers, the groenlet, the solitary vireo, etc.,—become birds of the groves and orchards, and there would be a burst of song indeed.—The Century.

An albatross has recently established for his species a new claim to the reverence and gratitude of sailors. A seaman on a vessel bound for Australia fell overboard in a stormy day into a raging sea and no one hoped to save him. But as the man rose to the surface, close beside him was an albatross, around whose neck he threw his arms, and thus, with much flapping and floundering, he held on until he was lifted into a boat.

A canary bird died lately in Cincinnati of consumption. A year ago last summer the bird was left hanging in its cage one evening in the open window. Previously an excellent singer, soon afterward it began to droop and sang but little. Six months later the bird developed a well-defined cough, which could be heard distinctly in the next room. Remedies were administered, but without success, and the bird pined away and died, as doctors who were consulted said, of consumption.

A lady in Taunton, Mass., recently lost her pocket-book in which was a considerable sum of money. The next day the faithful family dog appeared at the door with it in his mouth, and dropped it at her feet as if he knew he had found a valuable treasure.—Bristol County Republican.

A LADY'S PET FISHES. There lives in Sandwich, Mass., on the borders of one of the most charming lakes in America, Mrs. F. H. Burgess. It has been her custom once or twice a day for quite a period to feed the fish in this lake, and a few days ago we chanced to be favored with an invitation to witness this novel feast. She first splashes the water with her hand, when in a moment there may be seen approaching from every direction hundreds of large shiners; then eels, varying in size from one to about three feet in length, may be seen cautiously approaching. Next turtles appear on the surface, ten, twenty, and thirty feet away, their necks stretched apparently to see whether it is friend or foe who is disturbing the waters. In less than three minutes these various species had collected directly before her, and as she commenced to feed the water was fairly alive with them. They take bread directly from her hands, and turtles would allow her to take them entirely out of the water, and while she held them in one hand, they would eat with the greatest voracity from the other. But the eels amused us most. There was one she called Quinn, measuring about three feet in length, that repeatedly came to the surface, and would glide back and forth through her hands, and several times she lifted him partially out of the water, but he was careful to keep his head under. He seemed to feel that she would take no undue liberties with him so long as his head was in its natural element; but the moment he saw daylight he would dart back as only an eel could. Another small one, about a foot in length, seemed to be particularly fond of her caresses, and could be handled about as she pleased, it being understood that he was to remain under water though.—Marlborough Union Journal.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1882.

The editor of the New York Christian Advocate, writing of his visit to the recent session of the Baltimore Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, says:

Bishop Wiley addressed the candidates for admission, and in a very forcible way. So far as vigor of delivery is concerned, it was the general remark that the Bishop had never seemed so strong. Perhaps it is the added fervor of the revival in Cincinnati, or improving health. It is no disparagement of Bishop Wiley's past to suppose it to be both. If anything would increase the fervor of a minister's delivery it would be to see his children and neighbors converted. A curious scene, which we give without comment, occurred when the questions were asked. To the question, "Will you wholly abstain from the use of tobacco?" two answered in the affirmative: one said, "I expect to," and the fourth, "I decline to promise." On the case of the last a debate arose, some holding that he should not be admitted. The chair was asked whether the questions were mandatory in such a sense as to govern the action of the Conference. The chair ruled that "the duty of the Bishop was to ask the questions, and the Conference, from the answers and all other sources of information, must decide whether to admit or not; that the application was with the Conference." When the question was taken the young man was admitted by a large majority.

It seems, from this, that those who refuse to promise to wholly abstain from the use of tobacco may be admitted into full connection, if the Conference is so minded. The chances of the lovers of the weed, depend on the Conference to which they apply. Baltimore is likely to become a popular Conference.

"Oh! What a stop to obituaries will the sound of the last trumpet put, and long to hear its music." So writes a minister, who encloses an obituary for the ADVOCATE. That last trump will put a stop to many things. There shall be no more death. Death shall be swallowed up in victory. Sorrow and sighing shall flee away, and all tears shall be wiped away. Sin, death and the grave! How full of these sad words, and the fearful and repulsive things they represent, is this present world. It does quicken the pulse, and makes the spirit bound, to think of that day when there shall be no more obituaries, no in memoriam, henceforth. The last trumpet is usually described as breaking upon the world like a peal of thunder, as something terrible and jarring and harsh. To saintly ears, however, it will be musical, sweet as the notes of a lute, and invested with the most entrancing harmony. "To all them that love his appearing," the strains of that last trumpet will come as softest melody, not to startle and alarm, but to thrill with an everlasting joy.

The Anti-Polygamy Bill, passed by both houses of Congress, and approved by the President, seems to give general satisfaction. The bill, as it became a law, is summarized as follows by the New York Independent:

1. That polygamy or bigamy in the territories of the United States shall be deemed a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. 2. That, in order to conviction for this offense, it shall not be necessary to prove the actual rite bigamous marriage, but shall be sufficient if the fact of unlawful cohabitation be proved. 3. That, in prosecutions for bigamy, it shall be a sufficient cause for challenge to any person drawn as a juror if he has been or is guilty of bigamous practices. 4. That the President may, in his discretion, grant amnesty to such persons as have been guilty of bigamy before the enactment of the law. 5. That polygamists shall not be entitled to vote in the Territory of Utah or be eligible to any office in the territory or under the authority of the United States. 6. That all the offices of registration and election shall be vacated, and that the duties thereof shall be transferred to a commission of five persons be appointed by the President, who shall take the entire charge of the machinery for conducting the election of the next territorial legislature, count the votes, and declare the result, and that the legislature so elected may by law make provision for filling the offices of these commissioners.

Such is the outline of the law, and it is certainly a very great advance upon anything previously done by Congress on the subject. It will, undoubtedly, to some extent, increase the facilities of criminal prosecution and conviction of polygamists. How far it will be effectual to arrest polygamy by this process can be determined only by trial. What arts and methods of evasion will be resorted to by the Mormons, in order to dodge and neutralize the law, remain to be seen. The dodging will by no means be as easy as has hitherto been the fact, provided district attorneys and courts faithfully discharge their duties.

Public agitation and public opinion have compelled this action by Congress. These measures of reconstruction are stringent. "The Returning Board" feature of the bill, making the sixth item in the above summary, is the most important. As Utah is only a Territory, we suppose it does not violate the constitution of the United States. It is perhaps the only way to reach the crime, and to uproot it. If now there could be a heavy non-Mormon immigration to Utah, so as to give this element a preponderance, there would be some hope of suppressing polygamy. As it is, the new law may do some good, but how much remains to be seen. It is far from certain that the Mormon-polygamy question is settled.

The Passion.

At this season the thought of the Christian world is drawn to the suffering Christ. The agony in the garden, the scourging, the bitter cup of death—death on the cross—with its deep humiliation, and pain mysterious and unapproachable, will pass before the minds of the devout.

It is well to think of these things. We care nothing for particular days. Good Friday is as all other days to us, but still it is profitable for us to pause occasionally, perhaps frequently, and habitually, and recall the anguish and death-throes and sharp pain of the Crucified.

In such reflections there is much to repress the spirit of worldliness, and to rebuke frivolity and inordinate affection. The godlessness of fashion, as it displays its jewelry and costumes, and revels in intemperate feasting and lascivious pleasures, is shamed by the scene of Calvary. The frequent study of the story of the crucifixion would surely restrain from sin, and incite to careful and holy living.

The love of Christ to us finds its strongest expression in the sufferings of the cross. "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." "Who loved me, and gave himself for me." It is in this way that we are to think of Calvary. It was for us that Christ suffered and died. The greatness of his love is seen in the depths of his humiliation, and in the severity of his sufferings. It was at such a cost as this that we have been redeemed, and that we have opened to us the boon of life everlasting. The Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering. Through it he became a perfect Saviour, finished the sacrificial work, and bore our sins in his own body on the tree.

It makes us shudder when we attempt a vivid realization of the throbs of pain, the travail of soul, the cruel details of the execution. And yet the scene is drawn by the inspired pencil for this very purpose, that we may gaze upon it, study it, and let its coloring of blood and darkness sink into our hearts. It was placed upon the gospel canvas that the world may look upon it, and be impressed by it.

That suffering was somehow connected with God's administrative justice, and necessary to man's deliverance from the condemnation of the law. The moral influence derives its strength from this necessity, as related to the divine government. Christ must suffer, or there could be no deliverance for a perishing world. It is this imperative necessity, in its bearings upon the divine administration, that brings out the wonderful love of God and of Christ. Our faith grasps this much, "that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." There is no more affecting truth than this, none so calculated to awaken sorrow for sin, the desire of heart purity, and supreme love to Christ.

The passion of our Lord is therefore something to occupy the thoughts and study of all believers, and for the pulpit to dwell upon. As far as possible, careless and worldly professors, and also the indifferent and unbelieving, are to have this aspect of the gospel message pressed upon their attention. The crucifixion of Jesus happened long ago, and our interest in it is somewhat abated by time and distance, and also by our reluctance to dwell upon the terrible tragedy. It is full of condemnation to all frivolity of spirit, and of awakening and unrest to those who have neglected the great salvation. The impenitent sinner has reason to tremble in the presence of the dying Christ, and it is natural for him to turn away from a picture that brings to him only conviction of guilt, and reminds him of his deep ingratitude and hardness of heart.

To the Christian believer, however, the sufferings of the Saviour incite to greater devotion. They melt and subdue him, and complete the conquest of his heart. He is crucified with his dying Lord, and out of this death he rises into a life of faith. As he looks upon Christ crucified, his old nature dies, he puts on the new man, and the selfish and the sensual in him give place to unreserved devotion. Sad, tragical, indescribably sorrowful as is the picture of the Redeemer's pain, it is the source of joy unspeakable. It is the cleansing blood that flows; it is the Lamb of God who dies; it is the consummation of the plan of infinite wisdom and compassion. It was on the cross that the Lord "laid on him the iniquity of us all."

The Resurrection.

Upon the resurrection of Christ, as a fact, hangs the hope of men. It is an essential part of the Christian faith, and the crowning miracle of the gospel. Happily the evidence is abundant. The proof that he rose is as conclusive as that he suffered and died. Besides the statements in the gospel history as to both of these facts, the existence and progress of Christianity, after the crucifixion, are inexplicable, except upon the truth of the resurrection. Christianity is itself to-day a demonstration of the resurrection of Jesus. The death and the resurrection of our Lord stand together as parts of the same history. Holding firmly to the resurrection, nothing can shake our confidence in Christianity.

It is, hence, the key of the arch, the single fact that binds and supports all. Christ was "declared to be the Son of God, with power according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." Christ "was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification." Christ is to us the crucified, and also the risen one. Christians are not to live unto themselves, "but unto him who died for them and rose again." So central and so vital is the resurrection of Christ, as the object of our faith, that it is written: "That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." It was the assertion of his resurrection that made the staple of the first gospel sermons, and that wrought conviction in the hearts of multitudes, and brought them to repentance. Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost was full of this doctrine, and the Holy Spirit wielded it with wonderful power. Paul's writings, and his habitual preaching, seem to have been imbued with this resurrection atmosphere.

It was the resurrection of Christ as the miraculous seal of the gospel, but also as having a special import beyond this. It carried along with it the resurrection of all men, especially the glorious resurrection of believers. Christ was "the first fruits of them that slept." His victory over death was for all. Because he lives we shall live also. His bodily resurrection gives shape and form to our apprehension of the future life, and invests it with substantial reality.

We can lean upon him who came forth triumphant from the grave. We can intrust our friends to him when death snatches them from our sight. We can commit ourselves to him in the final hour, because he has mastered this last enemy. He has shown his abundant power to overthrow death: "Fear not; I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." For the believer Christ has "abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light." As the resurrection and the life, he delivers from death, so that whosoever liveth and believeth, in him shall never die. The resurrection of Christ is invested with this special office of consolation. It assures us that sin has been atoned for, and that death has been overcome for us.

It not only reveals the possibility of our resurrection, and of our immortal life, but it assures it. Christ is himself the resurrection and the life. In him is lodged the power to call the dead from the grave, and in him is the fountain of life. His rising announces not what may be, but what must be. Death's empire is virtually broken. He is the Prince of life, whose kingdom counterworks and overthrows the reign of death. No wonder that the announcement to the disciples, that "he is risen," filled the sad-hearted and despondling band with joy, and that it was to them as life from the dead. They were then begotten unto a lively hope, and that hope thrills believing hearts now as it did then.

The blessed gospel story is always fresh, because it meets the needs of men who can find comfort nowhere else. As the passion tells us of love unto death for the lost, the resurrection tells of love revealing and assuring the perishing of life immortal. The dark scene of the agony grows, at length into the brightness of heavenly joy, and death is indeed swallowed up of life. The dying Victim, upon whom our sins are made to meet, becomes our risen Lord.

Politics and Prohibition.

In Mississippi the friends of prohibition have made every effort to keep the question out of politics. They believed, and yet believe, that all needed legislation might have been granted without affecting any legislator's Democracy or Republicanism. He might have preserved his party orthodoxy and fidelity, and yet voted for local option. But they positively, and some sneeringly, refused, and therefore forced the issue. The Democracy had an overwhelming majority in the Legislature, and that party must be held responsible for denying to the good people of the State the small boon they so earnestly prayed for. Gentlemen, on the floor of the Senate, declared that the Democratic party could not afford to go to the people with a prohibitory law in the statute-books. Such a measure—striking down the liquor business—would achieve the party's overthrow. So then, according to that utterance, the party is wedded to whisky. They stand or fall together. The temperance sentiment is considered so small, penniless and feeble, that its friends can be snubbed, but whisky must be placated. If that be the doctrine of the dominant party—if the bar-room element is necessary to its continuance in power—then the fact ought to be declared, and let the more respectable members of it seek a party home elsewhere. We know there are many gentlemen, of high character and great ability, who will refuse longer to train with a party if it continues this course. So their coquetting with the liquor power, we predict, will be the chief agency of disintegration and overthrow. Having failed in every earnest endeavor to secure some needed repressive law—for our present law is a miserable farce—we are in favor of thrusting the great issue into the political arena. Let the question be decided at the ballot-box, where every citizen can declare his honest convictions as to the matchless evil. No man should command the ballot of any temperance voter who does not declare himself against the doggeries. The rule of the caucus must not bind any freeman's conscience on this vital issue. Let him vote for conscience's and humanity's sake. Christian citizens must vote as they pray. If they can not pray for a drunkard to hold office, neither can they vote for him. Our prayers for public and civic virtue are a sin and solemn mockery if we vote for pot-house candidates for places of public trust. Shame on the Christian of such easy conscience.

Hundreds of gentlemen, members of the two great parties, but ardent prohibitionists, were led to believe that the recent Legislature would grant a wise, repressive law. With that assurance they deprecated the issue being precipitated in the last canvass, and patiently waited, only to see their petitions spurned with lofty disdain. With the memory of this action burning within them, they will not be disposed to trust their cause to such friends again. We verily believe there must be a political uprising before deliverance from the damnation of the doggeries can ever be achieved. The great parties must see and feel the power and purposes of a third party, strong and clear in the enunciation of its principles. This course is forced upon us. As is well known, this writer advised against it, hoping for better things than we have received. Now, with our disappointment comes the solemn conviction that the temperance people must organize. We are wasting precious time, and the lives of valuable young men are being sacrificed. We can not longer wait. If our present parties are afraid to attack this mighty monster, we must cut loose from such ties, and band ourselves together for the struggle. That the appeal of our people has been so shamefully treated will add naught to the fair name of the Legislature. To all lovers of freedom—freedom from the dominion and degradation of liquor—we say come out from among such party associates, and be ye separate.

Notes from Nashville.

We have a missionary revival among us. Dr. Wilson has just had printed a History of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. It is a concise manual, and it should be placed in every family and Sunday-school in the connection.

Dr. Cunnyngham delivered a capital discourse yesterday morning at West End on Woman's Missionary work. I was preaching in a Presbyterian Church at the same time, and so was denied the privilege of hearing it. They say it was capital, and I warrant it was. He is an old missionary, and he knows the ropes.

Wesley Hall, Vanderbilt, is wide awake on the subject. Several lectures on Hallenties have been recently delivered to the students. They have formed a missionary society, and are gathering a library and museum. They respectfully solicit donations to both. The Young Men's Christian Association is alive to this interest. We had a visit recently from the State University; we made it quite an occasion. Our visiting friend and others—one being Prof. J. W. Dodd—delivered addresses, which were well received. Dr. Dodd, as well as his brother, the preacher, is a great favorite among the boys. He helps them much.

What a delightful discourse we had in Vanderbilt Chapel yesterday afternoon! It was delivered by the Rev. R. K. Brown, pastor of Elm Street Church. It was on "Trials." It was much in the vein of Cowper's beautiful hymn:

'Tis my happiness below
Not to live without the cross,
But the Saviour's power to know,
Sanctifying every loss.

The preacher spoke from his own experience, as he has passed through great trials. The discourse was an excellent sequel to one delivered the previous Sunday, on Job, by Dr. Granbery—a masterful effort. We should like to see both discourses in print. Our homiletical friends may take this hint. It is pleasant to see all our "officials" back again. Bishop McTyeire was in his seat in the chapel, as usual, yesterday. It is pleasant to see him there, and walking over the grounds. If a Bishop means overseer, then he is a Bishop, for he oversees everything.

Dr. Wilson has returned in good health; he is now bringing out the April number of the Missionary Advocate, a paper which ought to have a wider circulation than it has. It is edited with great ability, and is well adapted to advance the cause to which it is devoted.

A day or two ago I read the proofs of the April number of the Woman's Missionary Advocate. It is excellent. We are glad to see that this paper is so great a favorite; let its circulation still increase.

Dr. Kelley is at home. He spends considerable time in the office, and does a great deal of good work for the Board of Missions. In the April number of the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, just about to be launched, he has an excellent article on missions, fresh and forcible. Let everybody read it. By the way, the April number of the Quarterly is largely a missionary number—in view of the approaching General Conference.

We mean business. Droughts and floods and panics have had a bad effect on our treasury, but the board is not discouraged. This is the Lord's work, and panics, floods and droughts must not interfere with it.

Say to thy gifted servants, "Speed!"
Behold, the world your field."
Say to the gold, "The Lord hath need,"
Till hoarded treasures yield.

The board earnestly desires that all the missionary money that can be collected be forwarded at once to the treasurer, for "the Lord hath need of it" now. Let the preachers heed this. Commencement casts its shadows before us. We shall be pretty well prepared for it. Many of our biblical students are desirous of finding suitable employment during the vacation. They would rather preach than do anything else. Presiding elders who may want supplies should write to us as soon as possible. We want our students to exercise themselves in the field, for their own good, as well as the good of others; and then the compensation they receive will enable them to return at the next session.

Dr. McFerrin is at home, sound and hearty? No, not exactly at home, for he went to the country on Saturday to preach somewhere on Sunday. That is his way; he is always at it. What a ruling elder said to me yesterday, "You will die in the harness," may well be said to him. Well,

Happy if with my latest breath
I may but gasp his name,
Preach him to all, and cry in death,
"Behold! behold! the Lamb."

Though we had been anticipating the death of Mr. Longfellow, we were shocked when the telegraph announced, on Friday, March 24, that he was dead. As a poet, he has left no superior; not even the Laureate. He was emphatically the poet of America, and on this he has claim to originality. He derives his illustrations largely from the flora and fauna and history and manners and customs of America. He was born in the North, and lived in the North, and a Southerner feels a lack of certain elements which would make his poetry more American than it is. Then it must be admitted that he had not the exquisite sensibility of Shelley, or the darling genius of Byron, but his poems are free from all taint of immorality; so that, in that sense, when dying he had nothing which he might wish to blot. Mr. Longfellow was a little older than our sainted Wightman, the former having been born in 1807, the latter in 1808.

THOS. O. SUMMERS.

NASHVILLE, March 27, 1882.

The Lord's Day League.

Last week we noticed the meeting at Grunewald Hall, in New Orleans, principally of ministers of the gospel, called to devise measures to promote a better observance of the Sabbath. Another meeting was held on Monday of this week, and the committee appointed at the previous meeting reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted with great unanimity:

Whereas, We, the undersigned, believe that the observance of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday or the Christian Sabbath, as a day of rest from servile labor, and for the worship of Almighty God, is essential to the morality and the well-being of a community, and

Whereas, We believe, in the words of our Lord, that "the Sabbath was made for man," and that no community can be deprived of it without loss and injury, and

Whereas, The day of rest, held sacred among Christians, is desecrated among us, to the wrong of individual sufferers, and to the bringing up of an evil report upon us as a city; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, agree to form ourselves into a league or association for the promotion of the better observance of the Lord's day in New Orleans.

We do so on the distinct understanding that we are not seeking to coerce any man's conscience nor to restrict any man's liberty.

We seek only to educate public opinion, and to cultivate public sentiment, by reason and legitimate persuasion.

We do not meddle with the various theological opinions concerning the religious obligation of the day, or about the religious manner in which it should be observed. These we leave to the authorized teachers of the various religious bodies.

Our view of the day, so far as we concern ourselves as a league, has regard to its use and need, economic, social, moral and educative, for the community and the individual.

We therefore pledge ourselves to discourage and discountenance, by our example and in our own families, all unnecessary servile labor on the day of rest.

Furthermore, to discourage and discountenance such public amusements as involve the servile labor of men and women, who have a right to the day of rest by the charter of Christian liberty, and of which other people have not the right to deprive them, either for their selfish gain or for their selfish pleasure.

And, furthermore, believing that the most perfect rest for toil-worn humanity is found in lifting it up to the contemplation of its high destiny and its loftiest possibilities, we will, in every proper way, encourage the use of the hours freed from the vulgar and grinding cares of life, for the consideration of man's relations to things eternal, the worship of Almighty God, according to each man's conscience, and the lifting up of the heart and soul to the Maker and Father of men.

For these reasons, and upon this understanding, seeking the best good of the community, of which we are providentially members, and believing in a quiet, orderly, sober and religious Lord's day, in every way desirable and needful for its education and development, and pledging ourselves, by example and kindly persuasion, to aid in bringing about such a result, we append our names.

Resolved, That it is recommended to the meeting to constitute an executive committee consisting of nine members, including a president, a secretary and a treasurer, who shall be ex-officio members. The duty of such committee to be in general care of the interests of the league and the forwarding of its objects.

It was voted by the committee to recommend that the clergy be requested to preach upon the observance of the Lord's day on the third Sunday of April.

As it was not deemed advisable to go into the election for permanent officers until the league was firmly established and a goodly number of members had joined the same, Bishop Galleher offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a Provisional Committee of nine members be raised, whose duty it shall be to make public the platform adopted, to procure signatures, and to arrange for a meeting, at which the league may be organized by the election of officers and a Provisional Executive Committee.

On motion of the Rev. A. S. Clark, the committee was composed of the same gentlemen who prepared the draft for a platform, as follows: Rev. Dr. Palmer, chairman; Bishops Keener and Galleher, Judge McGloin, Dr. Hugh Miller Thompson, Dr. Walker, Dr. Landrum and Revs. C. W. Allen and H. Kleinhagen.

On motion the meeting adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman of the Provisional Committee.

The committee held a meeting immediately after adjournment and fully discussed the subject, when it was decided to hold a meeting in Grunewald Hall on Monday next at noon, all the clergy and laymen in favor of the movement being requested to be present.

Methodism in Mobile.

Rev. H. D. Moore, writing to the leigh Christian Advocate, from obile, Ala., says:

think, of all the localities I have own, there is not one where the se of Methodism is above that to be nd along this coast; and certainly, this city, there is as much devoon to the doctrines and usages of church, as is to be found anyere throughout our bounds. As ly as 1882, Alexander Talley visited obile, as a missionary of the Methoist Church. He was sent to preach at ensacola, Mobile, Blakely and in the joining country." For the next two ars no mention is made of the mission the fruits of the missionary's labors. 1837 H. P. Cook was appointed to ve the mission, and in that year the urch was organized with a membero of 37 whites and 37 colored. This s the beginning, and to-day, leaving "Pensacola, Blakely and all the joining country," there are in Mobile one, nearly 1,100 white members and re than as many colored. During these years the church has had ong its pastors, J. R. Lambuth, R. Walker, Jefferson Hamilton, L. erce, T. W. Dornin and others of character, but not so widely own; and there is no cause for nder, with those who know what those men were, at the present character and prosperity of the church they served. Our Sunday-schools are in a very good condition. There are about 1000 pupils enrolled, with a very fine average attendance. Class meetings are kept up, and are a power for good in elevating the standard of piety among us, and in training young members of the church. Our people, too, are liberal in supporting the institutions of the church. Last year there were raised for church purposes more than $10.00 for every member of the church in the three organizations here, and this fell below the amount raised the year previous.—These statements are made in no boastful spirit, but to let your people of the "Old North State" see that Methodism is neither dead nor dying in this part of the field. We surely ought to have accomplished more for the Master; yet, as we see what has been done, we thank God and take courage.

The commencement exercises of the medical department of the University of Louisiana took place at Grunewald Hall, New Orleans, March 29. Dr. Brice M. Hughes, of Tennessee, was the valedictorian. The following degrees were conferred:

Rev. T. S. West, presiding elder of Seashore district, Mississippi Conference, writing from Seashore Camp Ground, April 3, says:

Bro. Downer is having a very successful meeting at Scranton, fourteen accessions up to date, the meeting still continues. He is laboring acceptably in all parts of his charge. Bro. Weems has also had a protracted meeting at Moss Point, that he considers successful. I don't know the number of accessions

The Nashville Christian Advocate, writing about our mission fields, says:

Mexico, China, and Brazil are the special foreign mission fields of Southern Methodism. Providential indication, occupancy, and a measure of success already attained, make these fields ours in a true and stirring sense. The vicissitudes through which these missions have passed have tried the faith and earnestness of the church, and given our people the opportunity to determine whether we were "playing at missions," or had set out, in obedience to the command and relying upon the promise of our Lord, to do our part in bringing the world to Christ. During the last decade progress has been made. Our people have to some extent grasped the true missionary idea, and it has mightily moved them. Their contributions have been increased hopefully. A few cases of enlarged individual beneficence have astonished the multitude who have not risen to the conception of the true motive and full measure of missionary giving, and given joy to the hearts of the few who see in these streaks of light the dawning of a new day. A clearer apprehension of Bible teaching on this subject has resulted from the strong and pointed popular addresses of our missionary secretary and other agencies by which the mind and heart of Southern Methodists have been reached. No small part of this advance in sound sentiment and in liberality is owing to the impetus given to the cause of missions among us by the movement among our women.

AN INTERESTING OCCASION.—The meeting at Ashland was, says the Richmond Christian Advocate, of March 25, brought to a close on Sunday night last. More than fifty persons made a profession of religion, and on Sunday morning about forty stood around the altar and took upon themselves the sacred vows of church membership. These were all young persons, many of them students at the college, and some young men of great promise for the future. The class-meeting on Sunday afternoon was a pentecostal occasion, when the spirit's power was manifested and a gracious influence fell upon all present. This revival will be wide-reaching in its influence, if those young converts are properly trained and put to work for Jesus. There are but five or six unconverted young men left in the college.

Some idea of the good that has been accomplished by the Christian Woman's Exchange of New Orleans can be formed when it is known that during the first year of the existence of the exchange over $11,000 have changed hands, and that of this large sum the greater part has gone to the needy women for whose benefit the exchange was opened.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Rev. J. O'B. Lowry, late of New Orleans, is now pleasantly settled at Kansas city, Mo. He says: "The Calvary Baptist Church is a fine body. The field is stimulating and the material choice. We are hoping for a spiritual refreshing."—Standard.

—Since our last issue of the Advocate, there has been some decline in the overflow in the cotton belt, but the floods have increased greatly in the sugar regions of lower Louisiana. The Atchafalaya, Teche and Grosse Tete sections suffer more than any other. These are the most beautiful and productive parts of the State, and the prospect for abundant crops was never better until the waters came. Besides the sufferings entailed on the people, many will be broken up financially, and the destruction of property will amount to millions. There is not likely to be any abatement in the deluge in Southern Louisiana for two weeks to come. In some instances the sugar planters may make a partial crop of cotton, provided their fields are clear by the first of May.

—James A. Lusk, an old and well known citizen of New Orleans, died on board the steamship Whitney, at sea, March 27, 1882. Mr. Lusk was returning from Mexico, whither he had gone for his health. His daughter, Miss Flora, was with him during the trip, and ministered to him with the most devoted care. He stood high in business circles for his uprightness and integrity. He was a native of Alabama, and at the time of his death, in the sixtieth year of his age. We have known him well for the past thirty years, and can testify to his benevolence, kindliness of heart and generosity. We tender to his children our sincere sympathy in the great loss they have sustained by the death of an affectionate father.

—We notice that Rev. W. C. Webb, lately pastor of Ames' Methodist Episcopal Church, of this city, has been transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, and appointed to Grace Church, in the city of Philadelphia. We regret to part with our Bro. Webb. He has deported himself here as a true minister of Christ, and has commanded the respect and confidence of both branches of Methodism. May all his successors at Ames' Church be men of his stamp and of his spirit. In his new, and probably more congenial and ample, field of labor we wish him abundant success. He will show himself an approved workman to whatever post he may be called.

—We have heard that Dr. C. K. Marshall contemplates writing the life of Rev. Preston Cooper, a well known minister and member of the Mississippi Conference, who died several years ago. Mr. Cooper was a very remarkable man, and his biography, as written by Dr. Marshall, would be a most interesting work.

—We very much regret to learn that Mr. Samuel G. Upton, the father of Mr. E. S. Upton, foreman in the ADVOCATE office, died, at his home in this city, Monday, April 3, at the ripe age of seventy-five years. He was a devout believer in Christ as his all-sufficient Saviour.

Personal and Other.

—The late Greenville Murray, in an article recently published in the Geneva Continental Times, speaks as follows of the Prince of Wales:

"The Prince is thoroughly enlightened in his views on the leading questions of the day. The son of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert could hardly be otherwise, whether one considers the remarkable abilities of his parents or the excellent education they bestowed on their children. While on this topic, one may venture to call attention to a popular fallacy expressed in the sentence that 'there is no royal road to learning.' The path of knowledge is made exceedingly smooth for a Prince of Wales. That the best books, the ablest professors, the choice of hours should all be at his disposal—this may be a small thing; he has access to stores of information which other students could not obtain for love or money. From his earliest youth he is placed in frequent and familiar intercourse with men who make history. Even in these days of mayors of the palace he may be said, in some sense, to make it himself. The education which many scholars begin to receive at thirty and many others never receive at all—the education which consists in knowledge of the world—he acquires easily and pleasantly without leaving his home."

—The venerable Peter Cooper is in excellent health and recently celebrated his ninety-second birthday. He says of himself: "I have never been better in my life, nor more free from pains and aches. In previous years I have suffered a good deal from a complication of troubles, some of which were due to an explosion of chemicals. Once my brother and I were experimenting with chloride of nitrogen gas, one of the most powerful agents known. We thought that in it we would have a motive superior even to steam, if we could only control it; but there came a terrific explosion, which blew the machine to atoms and wounded me severely in the eye. I was born in Little Dock street, now Water street, near Coenties slip. Pearl street and Coenties slip were the great centers of trade then."—New York Independent.

—Cardinal Newman does not approve of the current fashion of writing the lives of men while they are living—at any rate, so far as his own life is concerned. When it was recently announced than an English firm had arranged for a biography of him, he promptly caused it to be made known over his own name that the work was not approved by him, that, in fact, he had declined to read the proof-sheets, when asked to do so, saying: "The time for a biography of him had not come."

—In connection with the celebration of Daniel Webster's centennial the Boston Post recalls the fact that his brother Ezekiel died at Concord, N. H., on April 10, 1829, while arguing a case to the jury. He had just said: "This, gentlemen, you have in evidence"—speaking the words in his usual full and distinct tone, when he threw his head back spasmodically and fell to the floor, where he lay as rigidly as if he had been dead for hours.

A MINIATURE OF AARON BURR.—Burr lived until 1836. I remember that as I was walking one day, in my early boyhood, with my father in Maiden Lane, he pointed out to me a little, shambling old man, with a rumpled white cravat, hair whiter than his cravat, and a rusty black coat—a very forlorn and doleful-looking creature. "When you are older," my father said, "the time will come when you will remember that you have seen that man: that is Aaron Burr."—Richard Grant White, in the Century.

—Mr. Jackson, the young American, who has become the favorite friend of the king of Wurtemburg, has ceased to be a citizen of the Republic, having sworn allegiance to the country wherein he has come to high honor. He has lately been made a baron and privy councillor and his breast is covered with decorations bestowed upon him by the Austrian Emperor, by his royal friend, and by the king of Saxony.

—A "black list" showing some of the fruits of the liquor traffic is issued from time to time by the English Alliance News. The last number showed that no fewer than fourteen cases of murder and manslaughter, fifteen cases of suicide, and a hundred and twenty violent deaths, directly traceable to the use of intoxicating liquors, occurred in Great Britain during the last week of 1881, and the first of the new year.

—In a letter to the Wilmington (N. C.) Star, Dr. J. L. M. Curry, general agent of the Peabody educational fund, says that the income of the fund does not exceed $100,000 annually, and that the plan is to aid especially in educating teachers for the public schools and in defraying a part, not the whole, of the expense is sustaining well-conducted, properly graded schools "located at influential points."

—Rosa Bonheur, the artist, is now fifty-eight years old and is failing in health. She is the first woman whose pictures were admitted to the Gallery of the Luxembourg, Paris, and her later works have, probably, brought the highest prices ever paid for the efforts of one of her sex. Her first picture was received at the Salon when she was nineteen and had had but little instruction.

—Gen. Grant, when asked recently where was the sword which he wore at Lee's surrender, answered: "I didn't have any on. I seldom wore a sword; I did wear one at the battle of Shiloh, and it saved my life. A ball struck it and broke the scabbard, which dropped on the field. I believe Mrs. Grant has the blade. She is better at saving things than I am."

—Charles Dickens, Jr., the son of the great novelist, is described as a practical, unromantic young man, who devotes himself to the more lucrative forms of publishing, such as guide books, etc. He has just issued the "Continental A. B. C. Railway Guide," for the use of American and English travelers.

—Justice Horace Gray looks more like an Englishman than an American. He is the tallest man on the bench of the Supreme Court. His height is five inches over six feet—several inches more than Justice Harlan possesses. His proportions are not as full as Mr. Harlan's and this increases his apparent height.

—The famous names of France are fast disappearing. Only twenty-three of the former peers now exist. Among those are one prince, three dukes, five marquises, ten counts, two viscounts, and one baron. One of the ten counts is M. le Comte Marie Victor Hugo, better known as plain M. Victor Hugo.

—Mustapha, the exiled minister of the Bey of Tunis, lives in luxury in Paris, where he has invested a fortune in house property. The Grand Duke Nicholas is one of his tenants, the Crown Princess of Brazil another.

—During the past year the Methodist Episcopal Church lost by death one hundred and twenty itinerant ministers. Their average ministerial life was a little over thirty-two years.

—Abbe Bieliory, late chaplain to Pere Hyacinthe, has been received into membership by the American Protestant congregation at Rome.

—A nephew of Robert Burns is living in a charitable institution at Glasgow. He is an old man-of-war's man named Gilbert Bogg.

—The coronation of Czar Alexander III, has been postponed until July.

—Over one hundred and fifty thousand copies of "Helen's Babies" have been sold.

—The death is announced of the Rev. Charles John Elliot, vicar of Winkfield, and one of the Old Testament revisers.

CHRISTIAN HOLINESS; its philosophy, theory, and experience. By Rev. S. H. Platt, A. M. Brooklyn, N. Y.: The Hope Publishing Company. 12mo, 288 pages. Price $1.

The author, in this work, certainly does not follow the beaten track altogether. It is an elaborate discussion of the theology, philosophy, psychology and experience of Christian Holiness. Our examination of the book has been too hasty to warrant an opinion as to its merits.

—Revivals; their place and their power, by Rev. Horrick Johnson, D. D., is a little book of great value. The author gives a definition of revivals, vindicates them, points out evils to be avoided, the conditions essential and work coincident with and subsequent to revivals. The volume is neatly bound in flexible cloth, 35 pages, price 25 cents. F. H. Revels, publisher, Chicago.

—We have received from the publishers, E. and H. T. Anthony & Co., New York, two paper bound volumes entitled respectively:

Beneficent nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Laidley's Indian Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

A brakeman on one of the railroads entering Boston has been employing his idle time in linguistic studies. As a matter of practice, he has been in the habit of calling the stations in pure Sanscrit. This might have gone on indefinitely, had not a Harvard professor who was on the train the other day and discovered the cheat.

Mr. Philip Werlein, 135 Canal Street, New Orleans, can sell you a good Hale piano for $225, $75 cash and $10 monthly for fifteen months, no interest, including stool and cover. They are guaranteed for six years. This piano will be shipped to you on the cuplition if you are not suited there is to be no sale, and he pays all charges of freights. This is certainly very fair and shows the confidence that Mr. Werlein has in his pianos. A good organ with 9 stops will be sold for $75, payable $25 cash and $5 per month for ten months, if not satisfactory no sale. Write at once and supply your family with an instrument of one kind or another.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. ABOUT EARLY CHICKS.—Chicks that are hatched in midwinter, or even in early spring, need an immense amount of care to carry them up to a marketable size. In addition to well lighted, well warmed and well ventilated quarters they must have plenty of the right kind of food and must be fed regularly and often. For two or three hours after the chicks leave the shells they should remain in the trays. At the end of that time they will be dry and lively and should be removed to the artificial mothers and then left undisturbed for twelve hours. Don't feed too soon. Lots of infant chickens come to an untimely end because their owners will stuff them as soon as possible after they get into this world. Twelve or fifteen hours after hatching is soon enough to give the first meal, which shouldn't be meal at all, but just hard-boiled eggs crumbled fine. The clear eggs that are taken from the incubator at the first testing should be saved for chicken feed. For the first few days the food should consist of hard boiled eggs, curds, stale bread moistened with milk and a little cooked rice. When four or five days old commence feeding cooked corn meal, oat meal, boiled potatoes, and as soon as you quit the boiled eggs a little cooked meal every day. The food may be seasoned slightly with salt and pepper, and two or three times a week give a little bone meal mixed with the food. Green food must be given once each day—it is indispensable. How to obtain in winter a constant supply of green food suitable for little chicks is one of the many problems that the poultry raiser must solve. We have settled the question, so far as we are concerned, by raising lettuce, grass and oats in shallow boxes hung around the room where we keep the chicks. A small box of lettuce lasts quite a while, for are only cut off the leaves with sharp shears and the roots soon send up a new crop. Early chicks must be fed often; not three or four times a day; but six times between daylight and dark. Feed each time all that the chicks will eat up clean, but do not leave any food around to sour. As soon as the chicks are big enough to swallow the grains the last feed at night should be wheat, wheat screenings, cracked corn, millet, &c., and just as soon as they leave the artificial mother and go to pecking and scratching around in the dry gravel or sand which should cover the floor it is a good plan to scatter wheat, cracked corn, &c., among the gravel and let them scratch it out. The object in feeding early chickens is to get the biggest and best chicken possible in a given time, and in order to do this we must keep them eating about all the time. There is but little danger of over feeding growing chicks, but there is a good deal of danger of under feeding and the wise poultry raiser will avoid it. Remember that if young chickens once get stunted from lack of food no amount of cramming afterward will ever make first class broilers of them. As to when to market, do so when your chickens are well feathered and will weigh from two to three pounds each, live weight, or from a pound and a half to two pounds dressed, they are ready to figure in the markets as "spring chickens." Don't send chickens that are "long and lean" and not more than half feathered, and don't send those that are no bigger than quails, even if they do happen to be well feathered. A few week ago I saw in an agricultural journal the following quotation, "The smaller the chicken, if well feathered, the greater the price per pound;" but several years' experience in raising and marketing chickens for broilers has taught me that a two pound chicken will sell quicker and bring more money than a one pound chicken. City people don't like to eat bones and feathers any better than we do, and besides when I sell anything I like to feel that I am giving the purchaser the worth of his money. —Prairie Farmer.

FERTILIZING IN THE DRILL.—We have never valued grain drills the more for being provided with fertilizer attachments. They are troublesome, cumbersome and worse than useless. The object of drilling in fertilizers is, as we understand it, to give the grain wheat, let us speak of) an early start. This may be very desirable, it is true, when for any reason the grain is sown late and a shorter time is allowed before freezing weather begins for the plants to tiller and fortify themselves against the severities of the long winter through which they are to pass. But if the land is fertile and unless it is wheat can not prove a profitable crop—and well tilled, and the wheat is sown early, why should fertilizers of any kind be used merely or primarily to give the wheat a start? Except in periods of great dryness the wheat will start in three or four days and a fertile and well prepared soil will insure a sufficient growth ere the advent of frozen ground and settled winter weather. It is a plain case that if wheat could be sown broadcast sowing would produce a heavier crop than drill sowing—the same quantity of seed being sown—for the reason that each plant would be less crowded by its neighbors and each root would find more nourishment. Fertilizing in the drill—the same as fertilizing in the hill for corn—stimulates the young plant. It induces an excessive growth of plants, which, without the fertilizer, would take full possession of the soil. But in the spring the roots have penetrated beyond the fertilizer, so that the seed-bearing culm or stalk, which requires the most food, receives the least. The young plant has been pampered at the expense of the old plant to which we look for our crops already. It is equivalent to eating a hearty meal in the morning for heavy work which is to be done the next day. When concentrated fertilizers are sown broadcast all parts of the soil are treated alike, and the roots of the plants through every stage of their existence experience the benefit. We stated that the fertilizer attachment was troublesome, and this for two good reasons: First, it can not well be made large enough to hold half, or indeed, a quarter enough fertilizer—so that almost every bout the lid must be raised and the box refilled. Second, it must be thoroughly cleansed immediately after use or the fertilizer becomes corroded and baked upon the zinc or other lining.—Rural New Yorker.

TEA CAN BE RAISED IN GEORGIA.—In demonstration of the fact that tea can be successfully raised in Georgia, the Hinesville Gazette, Liberty county, says that among the first experiments in this country in the cultivation of tea, was made by Capt. Wm. Hughes, Sr. Twenty years ago Capt. Hughes procured two plants from Mr. Jones, who had begun the experiment with a few plants brought by a returned missionary from China, and set them out and demonstrated that an excellent article of tea could be produced in this country. His son, Capt. W. Hughes, Jr., has kept up the little tea farm started by his father, and he has now over two hundred plants of very vigorous growth. He has besides furnished any quantity of seeds and plants to friends in all parts of the country. It takes but very few plants to furnish leaves enough to make all the tea a family will need for home consumption. There is no question but that this tea of home production, is not only equal, but superior to any of the imported article. This latitude is identically the same with that portion of China where the best tea is made. Such is the testimony of Rev. Young J. Allen, and others.

To go below the frost-line for tea-farming, is a mistake. Experience demonstrates that the leaves are purer and better after frost, which instead of retarding the growth of the shrub only partially obviates the necessity of pruning. It was a great mistake to abandon tea culture here.

TO KEEP TIRES ON WHEELS.—I ironed a wagon some years ago for my own use, and before putting on the tires I filled the fellowes with linseed oil, and the tires have worn out and were never loose. I also ironed a buggy for my own use seven years ago, and the tires are as tight as when put on. My method of filling the felloes is as follows; I use a long cast-iron heater, made for the purpose. The oil is brought to a boiling heat, and the wheel is placed on a stick so as to hang in the oil. An hour is sufficient for a common sized felloe, of which the timber should be dry, as green wood will not take oil. Care should be taken that the oil does not get hotter than the boiling heat, else the wood might be set on fire and burned. Timber filled with oil is not susceptible to water and is much more durable. I was much amused, some years ago, when I told a blacksmith how to keep his tires tight, by his telling me that it was a profitable business to tighten tires; and the wagon maker will also say that it is a profitable business to him to repair wheels, but what will the farmer, who helps support the wheelwright and smith, say?—Cor. Virginia Granger.

THE FEEDING OF HORSES.—The question whether horses are injured by being fed on new hay and new oats has been made a subject of investigation by a French military commission. The result of the experiments prove that the health of the horses was not injured by new hay, if they secured the regular ration along with other fodder. Of one hundred and fifty horses from four to thirteen years old, upon which the experiments were instituted, thirty-seven gained in fatness, and eighteen in strength and endurance. Only eighteen lost flesh and eight lost strength, while seventy-nine remained unchanged. A second experiment gave the same result. Experiments were also made upon one thousand eight hundred horses by feeding them on new oats, and were attended with favorable results; nearly all increased in bulk and strength. This is contrary to the generally accepted opinion.

A "DIAGNOSIS" OF THE CROPS.—The first thing a physician does when called to a patient, is to make a careful "diagnosis" of the case, that is, to examine all sources and causes of the ailment, its manifestation, etc., and then decide what is to be done. Every one having a field of wheat, rye, grass—or any crop in the ground over winter—should now make a diagnosis of the condition of every part of each field. If the growing crop of grain or grass is good in every part, that will be a satisfaction. If any fields, or parts of fields make a sickly or stunted show, the trouble most likely comes from one of two causes; the plants may have "wet feet," or they may be starving. In the former case surgery is needed; in the latter, food, or medicine in the form of a top-dressing of fertilizers. See the two items on "Making Land Dry," and Top-Dressing."—American Agriculturist.

BEES AND DROUTH.—A Melbourne correspondent of the Dundee Advertisor narrates what he considers an interesting proof of the provident and far-seeing instinct of bees:

"Tarolng from inco to insects, a singular circumstance is reported from a hot, dry valley in New South Wales. Last year the drouth there was of long duration, and the denizens of the apiaries suffered much from it. This year the bees have made provision against a similar emergency. They have filled a large number of the external cells in every hive with pure water instead of honey. It is thought that the instinct of the little creatures leads them to anticipate a hot summer."

The Mobile (Ala.) Chronicle, forcibly says: "Let the farmers of the South plant corn and turn it into meat, instead of keeping their cereal cribs and their smoke-houses away in the West. This will assure them comforts and leave their cotton as so much surplus cash, which can be used to enlarge or improve their farms, add luxuries to their households and educate their children. Let them, if so disposed, put this surplus in cotton mills or other works, the materials of which lie by their side. This policy within ten years, will make the South the most prosperous of any land that lies beneath the sun."

MEAT FOR POULTRY.—The poultry should be fed meat scraps three or four times a week with their other food, when, the ground being frozen, or from any cause, there are neither worms nor insects for them to pick up about the premises. Sometimes a beef's head can be bought very cheap from the butcher. It should be thoroughly cracked, and may be left in the yard for them to pick at. If you have the convenience for cooking it, feed a little at a time and stir the water that it was cooked in thick with meal and bran. Give this warm in the morning.

PEAS.—Peas are among the things to look after early. Get your seed early. The peas will stand a good deal of light late frosts. Early in the spring sow in double rows, which are the most economical. The manure should be fine. Thosphates are excellent if lightly mixed with the well pulverized soil of the drill. Cover with leaves and straw, after they are covered, and when the days grow warm uncover, and you will have fine early peas. The sprouts will stand a little frost nipping and grow again. The peas that come early from the South are the Philadelphia variety, good for the market, but not to our liking. The best dwarf variety we know is Early Premium Gem. The best high kind for very early is the Alpha perhaps not for market. If we were choosing one very early, variety it would be Premium Gem. The Champion of England is the best general mid late pea.

Household.

THE KITCHEN.—It is hardly to be wondered at that house-keepers sometimes become discouraged and ready to declare that they hate housework, or that girls are ready to employ their time anywhere else sooner than in the kitchen, when we enter these same kitchens and find them so inconvenient that they are but a miserable apology for what they ought to be.

The kitchen ought to be large enough to admit of the necessary work to be carried on there comfortably; it ought to be well lighted and yet shaded from the burning rays of the sun. The floor should be painted, either of a uniform tint, or by staining every alternate board. This is done by painting every alternate board with umber, (which may be procured already mixed with oil) and leaving each alternate board the natural color of the wood, giving them simply a dressing of oil.

Steps, and often needless steps are what tire house-keepers and wear them out when they ought to be in their prime. It really seems as if some of our houses were built in a way to make just as many steps as possible instead of saving them. The pantry is often separated from the kitchen by the dining room and there being, not even a closet in the kitchen, all the cooking utensils are at least twenty feet from the cook-stove.

The pantry should open out of both kitchen and dining room, and in every kitchen there ought to be a small closet near the cook-stove for holding a few plates, bowls, cups, knives, forks and spoons. There should be also, space in the cupboard for salt, pepper, spices, sugar, molasses and vinegar; and room in the bottom of the closet for pots, pans, skillets, etc. How many steps such an arrangement would save a house-keeper in one day to say nothing of the number saved in a month or a year.

There should always be a pump in the kitchen, than a few feet of rubber hose will enable one to fill the reservoir on the cook-stove, of the rinsing tub on washing day, without stepping from the pump or lifting a bucket of water. There are many other conveniences which any woman can contrive to save steps in the kitchen, and, dear husbands, let me just whisper a word in your ear. It will pay you to spend some thought and labor upon this same subject. Try it and see if your wives and daughters are not enough brighter and happier to repay you. They will not be "tired to death" all the time, but can do the work so much easier that they will be fresh and bright, and with time to practice up the long neglected music or to read the last new book with you in the evening. —Southern World.

WHAT IOWA GIRLS ARE TAUGHT.—At the Iowa Agricultural College every girl in the junior class has learned to make good bread, weighing and measuring their ingredients; mixing, kneading and baking and regulating her fire. Each has also been taught to make yeast and to bake biscuits, puddings, pies and cakes of various kinds; how to cook and roast, broil a steak and make a cup of coffee; how to stuff and roast a turkey, make oyster soup, prepare materials for other soups, steam and mashed potatoes so that they will melt in the mouth; and, in short, to prepare a first class meal, combining both substantial and fancy dishes, in good style. Theory and manual skill have gone hand in hand.

Vast stores of learning have been accumulated in the arts of canning, preserving and pickling fruits, and they have taken practical lessons in the details of household management, such as house furnishing, care of beds and bedding, washing and ironing, care of the sick etc. The girls we are informed, are also thoroughly grounded in science, mathematics and English literature. If there is anything that challenges the unlimited respect and devotion of the masculine mind it is the ability in woman to manage well her own household.—Southern World.

AN EXCELLENT WASHING MIXTURE.—Take three pints of hot water and slice into it two and a half pounds of common yellow bar soap and stir it up over the fire till it is dissolved. Then add two ounces of sal-soda, two ounces of borax and a teaspoonful of spirits of turpentine. Stir all together, until well mixed and dissolved. Take it from the fire and stir till quite thick, then turn into a pan or small tub and when cold cut into bars. When washing dissolve a large piece of it in a pint of boiling water, then wring out the clothes that have been soaking all night and put them into the boiler with cold water. Turn in the dissolved soap and let the water become scalding hot. Take them out and rinse in cold water, rubbing off any spots that are seen; wring again and rinse and blue hang out to dry. It saves a great deal of muscular strength, and it will wash colored clothes as well as white clothes, and is also good for washing white paint. After this small recipe is tried and found satisfactory a much larger can be made by increasing the recipe four or eight times, for the older the soap the better it is.

CLEANING BLACK SILK.—One of the things "not generally known," at least in this country, is the Parisian method of cleaning black silk; the modus operandi is very simple, and the result infinitely superior in that achieved in any other manner. The silk must be thoroughly brushed and wiped with a cloth, then laid flat on a board or table, and well sponged with hot coffee, thoroughly freed from sediment by being strained through muslin. The silk is sponged on the side intended to show; it is allowed to become partially dry, and then ironed on the wrong side. The coffee removes every particle of grease, and restores the brilliancy of silk without imparting to it either the shiny appearance or crackly and papery stiffness obtained by beer or, indeed, any other liquid. The silk really appears thickened by the process, and this good effect is permanent. Our readers who will experiment on an apron or cravat will never again try any other method.

REMOVING OLD PUTTY.—Vicks' Monthly reports the following as a good German method to soften and remove hardened putty: Dissolve potash in water, and add caustic or fresh lime. After a time pour off the clear liquid and bottle for use. Moistened with this, putty quickly softens. [It should be added, that the fresh lime makes the potash intensely caustic, and it should be kept from the fingers.]

THE FLOWER GARDEN.—Give your plants an occasional watering at the roots with a strong solution of soot. It will dispel the worms from the soil, and give a deep green, healthy color to the foliage. Strong tobacco water applied to the leaves will kill lice.

Scientific.

—Of the three state universities in the Netherlands, that of Leyden is largest in point of attendance, numbering 485 students on its rolls. Utrecht follows with 403, and Groningen comes last, with 202. In the newly created University of Amsterdam which is a provincial and municipal institution, receiving a limited state subsidy, the number of students was 577 in 1879—80, or 92 more than the highest number of students in either state university. The numbers of students in each of the universities were divided among the various faculties as follows: In Leyden University in Protestant theology 29; in law, 224; in medicine, 158; in natural sciences, 35; in philosophy and philology, 39; in all 485. In Utrecht, pursuing the the same order, the numbers were 180, 87, 89, 37, and 10, or in all, 403. In Groningen, 25, 55, 80, 22, 20, total 202, which makes the numbers in all of the universities entirely supported by the state 234 in theology, 366 in law, 327 in medicine, 94 in natural sciences, 69 in philosophy and philology, total 1,090. Now, in the University of Amsterdam, sustained by provincial and municipal contributions, the attendance for the same period was 22, 45, 34, 90, 77, total 577. The grand total was 256, 411, 670, 181, 130, or in all 1,667.

—The Bureau of Education has received the report of the minister of public instruction in New South Wales for the year 1880, showing that in educational and school privileges this distant colony of Great Britain is in advance of the mother country. The Public Instruction Act received the royal assent on the sixteenth of April, 1880, and, in accordance with the provisions contained in the fortieth section, came into operation on the first of May following. At the end of the year the number of schools in operation and the number of pupils in attending were the following: In 872 public schools, 81,045 pupils; in 218 provisional schools, 5,177; in 93 half-time schools, 1,695; in 24 evening public schools, 695; in 145 denominational schools, 23, 199; total 1,357 schools and 114,811 pupils.

—The allowance to the Educational Department of Japan for the current school-year is only 614,501 yen (one yen about $1), against 1,181,100 yen last year, a reduction of 566,499 yen, or nearly 25 per cent. It is right to observe, however, that the estimates of every department have been largely cut down and that much of the decrease under the head of education may be attributed to the substitution of native teachers for highly-paid foreign professors.

—The public schools of the State of New York were last year attended by 1,021,282 children, a smaller number by 16,000 than was recorded in 1880. Of the 30,826 teachers employed, 23,157 were women. The average annual salary of each teacher was $375.06, the whole amount expended in salaries being $7,775,595.22. The state has 11,218 school-houses. The total amount expended upon the schools last year was $10,808,802.40.

—Rev. Dr. Gladden thinks that pupils should learn such things as will tend to make them happy in whatever calling they may choose. He suggests that all possible ways should be devised in school to awaken the minds of the pupils and stimulate a thirst for knowledge; and he suggests that boys should be made to see that farm life is far from lonely or uninteresting. They should be taught natural history and mineralogy.

—Russia and France are just now most active in establishing manual training schools. In the Russian technical schools pupils pay about $15 a year, taking ordinary school instruction for four and a half hours a day and working for five hours. Austria has eighty industrial schools, which give instruction to about 4,000 pupils. In the French schools articles are manufactured for sale.

—The trustees of Dartmouth College decline to accept the resignation of Prof. Sanborn and have engaged ex-President Brown, of Hamilton College, a former professor at Dartmouth, to assist Dr. Sanborn. The medical department is to receive $2,000 from the will of the late E. W. Stoughton, of New York, to complete a collection for the pathological museum founded by him.

—The annual catalogue of the Syracuse University shows an attendance of 322 students. The institution is divided into three departments, the College of Liberal Arts enrolling 156 students, that of Medicine 12, and of Fine Arts 132. The total corps of instruction numbers 41, over which the Rev. Charles N. Sims, D. D., presides as chancellor of the University.

—The trustees of Hopkins Grammar School, at New Haven, desire to raise an endowment fund of $50,000, and have commissioned the rector to appeal to the friends of the institution for aid in that direction. The school has been established for over two hundred years, and has been especially useful to Yale College in furnishing candidates for the latter's freshman classes.

—The Czar of Russia has given his consent to convert seventeen imperial palaces into institutions of learning. These palaces will, of course, be used for higher schools, while nothing is done for the improvement of popular education. Russia has a school population of 15,000,000 and the number of children in primary schools is a little over one million.

—It is argued in Virginia that, instead of establishing normal schools to supply sorely needed teachers, it would be wiser to utilize existing institutions and to add two or three normal professorships to the university, requiring also each academic professor to give normal instruction in the teaching of his own branch of knowledge.

—There is a movement in the Kentucky Legislature for the equalization of the distribution of the school fund between the white and colored people of the State. A discrimination is now made against the colored people on the ground that they pay taxes on only $3,500,000 worth of property.

—There is a total attendance of 351 students at the Iowa State University, 85 taking the collegiate course, eleven of this latter number being women. The instruction is under the charge of a faculty of seventeen members, including the president, the Rev. George F. Magoun, D. D.

—The literary and industrial school which Mr. E. S. Morris, of Philadelphia, established at Arthington, Liberia, Africa, for the education of the sons of chiefs, is now in successful and most promising operation.

—Calcutta University is a remarkably prosperous and useful institution. Last year out of 2,702 candidates for admission, 1,885 passed. Six women took the entrance examination, and four were successful.

—President White says he will stop lecturing if he is obliged to expel every class in Cornell.

Worse than Soothing Syrup.

MR. EDITOR: I see the custodians of the health of New Orleans, are not a little exercised over a case of baby poisoning, by Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup.

I do not rise to defend Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, nor any other poison administered, medicinally or otherwise; but I do think, the city doctors could find a bigger thing, and make a greater show, if they would look either at the calls that reach them, or, these cases coming within their knowledge almost beyond the reach of remedies, made so by the use of a poison, dealt out right before their eyes, under sanction of law. The excuse is, the sellers and manufacturers pay license and yield revenue. That's a pretty plea is'nt it? Does not the syrup yield revenue? Are not patent medicines taxed? Drive Mrs. Winslow's Syrup out of the market, if it deserves it, but I can see nothing agreeable in the sight of men gargling and coughing at a gnat, and a camel running right into their mouths and down their throats. If they are men indeed, and want their opinions and professions respected, let them deal fairly. Strike the giant. Test his strength. Let us see a tussle with the monster that takes more bodily strength, more mind, more property, more lives, makes more homes desolate, and wrings more tears from orphans than a thousand Mrs. Winslow's Syrup—are they afraid? Let them be men.

They need not stop to put in excuses. The cases are daily before them. Let them tell the civil authorities what they know, the legislators what is transpiring in the range of their practice, and, if needful, appeal to judges, and executive officers for help in ridding the city and country of this frightful evil, and they will find the earnest and the thoughtful, of city and country their abettors and supporters. I know drinking liquors enlarges indefinitely their practice, it also destroys the means to pay for services. Indifference to this matter may raise the suspicion, that some doctors are confederated with the liquor interests, (i. e. making selling, and drinking liquors) against the lives and well being of men, women and children of our land. Show up this system of poisoning in our country, and an exhibition would be seen more frightful in its consequences, than elephants lions, tigers and snakes turned loose in our cities, towns and villages. A show awful in its terribleness, can be put forth, if truth and science are allowed to bring forward, in broad day light, their discoveries.

Yours, PIKAIOS.

Our Hearts as God Sees Them.

MR. EDITOR: While listening to a sermon by our pastor Rev. H. D. Moore, from the following text, Job, xi, 13, 14, 15, verses; I was deeply impressed, by the passage, "for then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot." When is this? Not until we have put iniquity away from us, and purified our hearts in the sight of God; and not merely to meet the requirements of public opinion. How many of us work for human reward, and when any meritorious act has been performed ask ourselves what A. or B. will think of us and congratulate ourselves that in the eyes of our fellowmen we have done a good deed. If by our benevolence we relieve object want, do we feel that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," or is our first thought, that for so doing our friends will think us charitable? When day by day we read the holy word of God, is it with a desire to profit by its teachings, or merely to quiet a smiting conscience? Sabbath after Sabbath finds us in our accustomed pews, listening to the promises of life through the blood of a loving Saviour, and do the words fall on prayerful hearts, and have we invoked God's blessing on the services, that the truth spoken may relieve some burdened soul; or does it satisfy us to know that some people will think we are very pious, simply because we are habitual church-goers? For several weeks, a service of prayer has been continued in the Franklin St. Church, and although the general attendance has been good the result has not been what we hoped for. Are we not in a measure to blame for it? Many who attend, we know are workers for Christ, and give their minds and hearts to his service, but if we all could see our hearts as God sees them, we would find that the fault is partially our own that so many souls are still wandering in darkness. Let us pray that God will show us what we lack, and give us such a knowledge of our hearts, that we may be enabled to "cast out the beam" from our eyes, and then can we see clearly to lead others to the cross. Our pastor has labored earnestly, and in a few brief months will be called to serve another people; but the result of his labors will enable many to say to him at parting, "through you I have found Christ." God grant that we be not counted drones in the Masters vineyard.

LIDA T.

Dying in the Right Place.

MR. EDITOR: When a professor of religion departs this life Christians are always glad to read the obituary of the departed one, provided it is written from a religious standpoint. The church wants to know where and how the Christian dies, but is not some professors of religion in danger of dying in the wrong place, so that it would be difficult to write their obituary? Suppose a brother or sister should die suddenly while attending a circus, theater, dancing party, or while riding out for pleasure on the Sabbath, what would be the dying message to the church in such a case? Christians can afford to die at any time, but not at any place. Mr. Editor, if we die in sight of heaven we must die in the right place, "therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

LAYMAN.

THE INSCRIPTION AT THE POOL OF SILOAM.—Great interest has attached lately to the inscription discovered by Mr. C. Shick in June, 1880, at the pool of Siloam, on the subject of which the first important contribution was a pamphlet by Professor A. H. Sayes, published last year under the title of "The Ancient Hebrew Inscription Discovered at the Pool of Siloam, in Jerusalem." More exhaustive articles, by Dr. Guthe and Professor Kautzsch have appeared in the Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palestina-Vereins, and the shorter notices by J. Derenbourg in the Comptes Rendus de l'Academie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, are well deserving of study, as is also a further notice by J. Halvy, as reported in the Revue Critique for Oct. 17, 1881. In the light of these previous commentaries, and from the study of two or three elaborate photographs of this inscription, Prof. Wright, of Cambridge, has been led to adopt as authentic a transcription of the text of the original Hebrew, as well as a translation of it into English, as nearly as that can be ascertained in face of the difficulties presented by missing or imperfect, and therefore doubtful or ambiguous letters. The character of the inscription must resemble those of the stele of King Mesha; but are more modern, and exhibit more practice and skill in writing. It is probably correct to assign this inscription to the time of Hezekiah' circa; B. C. 700, a determination of date arrived at it in the light of the passage which refers to the might of Hezekiah, and, his making of a pool and a conduit, and his bringing of water into the city II. Kings xx. 20), and of another text which declares how Hezekiah stopped the upper water course of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David (Chronicles xxxii. 30). The punctuation is the same as in the Moabito stone a point after each word, and the orthography also is much the same. There are two words in the inscription which do not occur in the Old Testament, the sense of one of them being clear, both from the context and the cognate languages, whilst the meaning of the other word is very obscure, as its root is not exactly known to us, and the context casts only an indistinct light upon it. The inscription is translated by Professor Wright as follows: "(1) . . . the breaking through. And this was the matter (or account) of the breaking through. While yet . . . (2) the pickaxes, one towards the other, and while yet there were three cubits to . . . the voice of one call-ing to the other, for there was a cleft . . . in the rock on the right . . . And on the day of the (3) breaking through, the miners hewed, one to meet the other, pickaxe against pickaxe, and flowed (4) the waters from the source to the pool over a space of one thousand and two hundred cubits. And one hundred (5) cubits was the height of the rock above the head of the miners." The inscription Professor Wright thinks, was obviously set up by the miners to commemorate their successful meeting after they had started from opposite ends of the projected tunnel or aqueduct. It has nothing whatever of an official character, otherwise its form and style would probably have been very different, and it would have been set up in a more conspicuous place.—Watchman, London.

"THE EARTH ALSO SHALL BE BURNED UP."—Mr Richard A. Proctor regards the final conflagration of "the earth and all things in it," foretold in the New Testament, as being not only in prospect, but in near prospect if certain astronomers are right in their calculations. If the comet of 1880 was identical with the comet of 1843 which Prof. Winnecke believes hardly admits of doubt, and with the comet of 1668, as Mr. Marth thinks may be the case, its velocity having been reduced by its passage through the corona of the sun, —on its next return, it may be altogether unable to pass out of the sphere of the sun's influence, and may precipitate itself, with all its meteoric train, into the mass of sun." If this event occurs, and he thinks it may occur in 1897, there will be an abrupt arrest of an enormous momentum, which would show itself in the form of enormously increased heat, and the probable result would be the bursting up of all the vegetable and animal life in the planets of the solar system. He thinks we have an example of such a cosmical catastrophe in the apparent conflagration of a star in the Northern Crown in 1866, when for a day or two the heat and light omitted by it became suddenly many hundreds of times greater than they were before, after which the star relapsed into its relative insignificence.

We who are not astronomers have the testimony of God's Word as to the certainty of the event thus anticipated. The evidence Mr. Proctor offers is good as far as it goes against any if there be any who say with cavillers of a former time, that the predicted end of the world is a physical impossibility. The resources for combustion are ample. But as for the time when the end shall come, we remember by whom it was said, "it is not for you to know the times nor the seasons." And we observe that our astronomical alarmists make frequent use of the form "may be." The comet of 1843 "may be" identical with that of 1668, and the identity of the comet of 1880 with that of 1843 "hardly admits of doubt," but does not seem really to have been put beyond doubt. Admitting these identifications, Mr. Proctor is not quite sure what would be the effect upon us of the absorption of the comet and its meteors by the sun. And 1897 is still some distance ahead. A good many of us will have done with this world before then, and need feel no personal concern about the havoc which that comet "may" make. We do, however "look for such things," as may well make us "diligent that we be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless."—Boston Watchman.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S

—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health;" and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive to many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

THE DEAD RESTORED TO LIFE.

Anyone desiring to have restored to their normal or natural condition, those organs of life whose functions have become impaired from excessive gluttony, intemperance or otherwise, will find health, strength and vigor in Brown's Iron Bitters. Where the weakness is of an exhaustive or debilitating nature, it removes all lifeless feeling and quickly awakens to new activity.—Herald.

A little girl in Chicago who sold the largest number of tickets for the "Prairie Mission," was called up to receive the prize of $5, and imediately donated it to the cause.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

PATTERSONVILLE, March 27.—From present prospects the water overflows every plantation on the east side of the river to St. Martinsville. All is now under from Centreville to Morgan City. Lockhart's, the last one, went under this morning. Nearly every one below Pattersonville, on the west side, will go, in my opinion.

COLUMBUS, Ga., March 28.—A special to the Enquirer-Sun says that yesterday morning a cyclone passed near Loachapoka, Ala., doing a great deal of damage. A number of houses were completely demolished and others were unroofed, and there was great destruction to fences and lumber. A man Tatum was instantly killed, another named Alvis was fatally injured, and a man named Thomas had his shoulder dislocated. A heavy wind and hail storm passed over a portion of Harris county, Ga., yesterday doing much damage.

MEMPHIS, March 30.—The Cincinnati and New Orleans packet Golden City, en route from New Orleans to Cincinnati, burned at the wharf this morning at half-past four o'clock. Between thirty and fifty lives were lost—principally women an children.

The steamer, when approaching the wharf, was discovered on fire by second engineer Robert Kelley, who immediately notified Capt. Brice Purcell, Sr., the pilot on watch. The boat's bow was at once headed for shore, and in four minutes afterward she touched the wharf at the foot of Beale street, where the coal fleet is moored. A line was hastily thrown and made fast to one of the coal barges, but the current being swift it soon parted, and the burning steamer floated down the river a mass of flames, with many of her passengers and crew aboard, who were unable to reach shore, and were lost.

The Golden City left New Orleans last Saturday en route to Cincinnati. She carried a crew of about sixty. She had aboard forty cabin passengers, including fifteen ladies and nine children. Her cargo consisted of three hundred tons, among which was a lot of jute. The fire is said to have had its origin in this combustible material.

Among those known to have been lost are Dr. Monahan and wife, of Jackson, O.; Mrs. Crary, of Cincinnati; Miss Luella Crary, of Cincinnati; W. H. Stowe, wife and two children; Ollie Wood and wife, of Henderson, Ky.; Mrs. Anna Smith, of Massachusetts; Miss Campbell, Mrs. Helen Percival, Mrs. L. E. Kouns and three children. The books of the steamer were lost, so it is impossible to gather a correct list of the lost and saved. All the officers of the steamer are safe except the second engineer, Robert Kelly. He it was who first discovered the fire and gave the alarm, and he remained at his post of duty until cut off by the flames, for the fire spread like lightning, and he sacrificed his life to save others.

AMHERST, Mass., March 30.—Fire destroyed Walker Hall, the finest of the Amherst College buildings. Loss about $250,000. The total loss is about $185,000; insurance $103,000. The loss beyond the intrinsic value, in paintings, records, philosophical apparatus and mineralogical cabinet, will be severely felt. The cabinet was the work of many years' labor, and had just been reclassified.

WASHINGTON, March 31.—The Secretary of War has directed that one hundred and fifty hospital tents be forwarded to New Orleans, to be distributed by the Governor of Louisiana.

NEW YORK, March 31.—The British steamship Westborne, from Marseilles, which arrived here to-day, reports having sighted a new volcanic island about latitude twenty-five and a half degrees north and twenty-four degrees west.

MEMPHIS, April 1.—The river continues to decline steadily and has fallen twenty-seven inches from the highest point. Between here and Helena, Ark., land on both sides of the river is coming gradually to view. Above here the decline has been greater and the prospects are proportionately brighter for farmers.

FRANKLIN, La., April 1.—The water is rising one inch an hour. A continuance of this rise for thirty-six hours will submerge Franklin and the back country. The prospect is alarming.

MEMPHIS, April 2.—Several parties visited the wreck of the burned Golden City to-day, but nothing could be discovered. The water rushes swiftly over the wreck and the noise made resembles the roar of a cataract. Dynamite has been telegraphed for and will be used in trying to raise any dead bodies that might be anywhere between where she took fire and where the wreck now lies. The remains of Mrs. Annie Smith, of Springfield, Mass., one of the victims, were interred this afternoon at Elm Cemetery.

NEW YORK, April 2.—The police were notified to-night that Cornelius J. Vanderbilt, brother of W. H. Vanderbilt, who contested the probate of the will of the late Commodore Vanderbilt, had committed suicide by shooting himself through the head at Glenham Hotel. The Coroner was notified and gave a permit for the removal of the body.

VICKSBURG, April 2.—The Sunflower arrived from the Big Sunflower this morning. She reports the water rapidly falling in that stream, and considerable planting and plowing is being done. The people are encouraged and express themselves as confident of making at least an average crop, both as to corn and cotton.

WASHINGTON, La., April 2.—The water has risen here two inches within the last twenty-four hours. Since last Saturday at ten o'clock forenoon it has risen six feet four inches. It is now four feet above the high water mark of 1874, and is rising at the rate of about one and one-half inches in twenty-four hours. Bayou Courtableau is away out of its banks. The water stands to the depth of four and five feet and is in the warehouses along the bayou to about the same depth. The Pelican Oil Mill and Bird's cotton gin, corn mill and shingle factory are submerged to a depth of five or six feet. None have suffered any material damage.

ST. LOUIS, April 3.—A dispatch from St. Joseph, Mo., says: Charles and Robert Ford, who at one time belonged to the James gang and were engaged in the Winston and Blue Cut train robberies, have been in St. Joseph for a week for the purpose of arresting Jesse James, but being afraid, as it is alleged, to make the attempt, they shot him down at the corner of Thirteenth and Lafayette streets to-day, and then surrendered to the authorities, and were lodged in jail. There is tremendous excitement over the affair, several thousand people being in the streets.

VICKSBURG, April 3.—The river at this point began receding on March 21, after reaching forty-eight feet nine inches above low water mark, and has fallen since that time twenty-two inches, including two inches in the past twenty-four hours. The gnats are playing sad havoc with the stock generally in many portions of the surrounding country. Tributary packets bring news of the water falling in all the streams at an average rate of two inches in twenty-four hours.

WASHINGTON, April 3.—The Cabinet session to-day was very protracted and was devoted almost entirely to the consideration of the anti-Chinese bill. It was understood that the decision was adverse to the bill, and that the President will send in a vele to-morrow.

Judge Blatchford took his seat in the Supreme Court to-day, and but for the temporary absence of Justice Harlan the bench would have been full for the first time since December 24, 1878.

FOREIGN.

ODESSA, March 31.—Gen. Strelnikoff, the public prosecutor of the Kieff military tribunal, was shot with a revolver while sitting on the boulevard here. The ball penetrated his head and came out through the forehead. Gen. Strelnikoff died immediately. The two assassins were stopped while fleeing in a carriage. They offered violent resistance and with their revolvers and poignards wounded three persons. They were finally overpowered and conveyed to the police station. Gen. Strelnikoff came to Odessa to conduct preliminary examinations in important political trials.

HIGH WATER IN ST. LANDRY.—Mr. D. R. Calder received a dispatch yesterday evening from Opelousas stating that St. Landry was under water, the river being three and a half feet higher than in 1874 and that it was still rising.

Last night a Times-Democrat reporter met Mr. Frank B. Heirs, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, who has been on a visit to his brother, W. A. Heirs, a land agent and surveyor of New Iberia. Mr. Heirs has just returned from New Iberia, and gives an account of the situation of the country from New Iberia to this city. He states that the Bayou Teche is rising at Franklin, Jeanerette and New Iberia at the rate of six inches a day. So far, no damage has occurred to planters, except on the east bank of the stream, near Franklin, where several plantations are entirely submerged. Berwick and Morgan City are eight feet under water, and the railroad bridge crossing the bay is only four feet above.

Swampers from the big woods around Grand lake are returning to the towns, the water having already reached the second undercut of trees, thereby rendering it impossible to bring out logs at present.

The back water from Bayou Courtableau caused a delay of two hours to both trains on the Morgan road between Vermillionville and Washington. The Bridge crossing Bayou Teche at New Iberia is only two feet above high water mark. If the water rises one foot more the bridge will be in great danger and will have to be kept open. —New Orleans Times-Democrat, March 31.

HUMAN TREES.—The most ingenious to escape is that shown by the Bheel robbers of India. It often happens that bands of these robbers are pursued by mounted Englishmen, and unable to reach the jungle, find themselves about to be overtaken upon one of these open plains which have been cleared by fire, the only shelter being the blackened trunks or leafless branches of small trees that perished in the flames. For men so skilled in posturing this is shelter enough. Quickly divesting themselves of their scanty clothing, they scatter it with their plunder in small piles over the plain covering them with their round shields, so that they may have the appearance of lumps of earth and attract no attention. This accomplished they shatch up a few sticks, throw their bodies into a contorted position, and stand or crouch immovable until their unsuspicious enemies have galloped by. When all is safe they quickly pick up their spoil and proceed upon their way.

The Rev. J. D. Wood gives an interesting account of the marvellous mimics. I quote the following: "Before the English had become used to these manœuvres, a very ludicrious incident occured. An officer, with a party of horse, was chasing a small body of Bheel robbers and was fast overtaking them. Suddenly the robbers ran behind a rock or some such obstacle, which hid them for a moment, and when the soldiers came up the men had mysteriously disappeared. After an unavailing search, the officer ordered his men to dismount beside a clump of scorched and withered trees; and the day being very hot, he took off his helmet and hung it on a branch by which he was standing. The branch in question which turned out to be the leg of a Bheel who burst into a scream of laughter, and flung the astonished officer to the ground. The clump of scorched trees turned suddenly into men, and the whole party dispersed in different directions before the Englishmen could recover from their surprise, carrying with them the officers helmet by way of a trophy."—Scribner.

AMERICAN HOME MANNERS.—American men respect women in the highest sense and treat them with all the chivalry possible, as far as immunity from insult is concerned. The national character of the American man in this respect is above reproach. But are they at home amiable and polite? Do they treat their wives, daughters or mothers with constant and daily and proper politeness? Are American women models in this respect? Do they remember to be grateful and polite in little matters of salutations and of compliment? Are they careful to consume their own smoke, and to bring only an amiable face to the dinner table? We are afraid not. The national home manners need improving. The amenities of home can alone make up for the national disadvantage. It is at the home dinner-table, by the hearth-stone, the evening fire-side, in the nursery, the bed-room and the sick-room, that manners must be taught. We cannot count upon outside influences for our children. Home first, and home always, must be to them what the external world is to the ignorant foreigners. There every institution teaches him by the iron hands of power and custom to be respectful. If he dares to be otherwise he is an outlaw and a criminal.—Appleton's Home Series.

Mr. J. Q. Lawrence, of Trenton, N. J., writes: "For several years my wife's health was very poor. It began with a miscarriage, from which she never fully recovered, and consequently suffered many aches and pains. I was advised to give her Brown's Iron Bitters. I did so. Her improvement began at once, and she says 'she now feels like a young girl.'"

No. 56 USE
THE MEDICATED GLASSES.
TRADE MARK
A WONDERFUL SCIENTIFIC

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, and possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, and with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

THE CHIMNEY'S SONG.

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the woman stopped as her babe she hossed
Some thought of the one she had long since lost
As it said, as her tear drops back she forced,
"I hate the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the children said, as they closer drew,
To some witch that is cleaving the black night through—
"It's a fairy that flies there below,
And we fear the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the man as he sat on his hearth below,
Said to himself, "It will surely snow,
Coal is dear and wages low,
And I'll stop the leak in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang;
And chanted a melody no one knew;
But the poet listened and smiled, for he
Was man, and woman, and child, all three,
And he said, "It is God's own harmony,
The wind that sings in the chimney."

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

My Dear Young Friends: I have no doubt you would like to hear more about the history of this ancient empire and of the strange people we call Chinese. I have written to you about Pankoo, who is represented in Chinese history as being the first man on earth. I also told you of one of their great emperors, whose name was Fuhe, and some persons think he was the Noah of the Bible; but the tradition of the Chinese states that he had no father, and that his name was Sing, which means wind or breath, and this to our minds would imply that he derived his life as well as his name from God as his Father. And this would lead us also to think the tradition had some reference to Adam who received his life from God. The same tradition states that he was perfectly holy, and that his holiness was as the light of the sun and moon, and that his posterity reigned fifteen generations. This may all refer to Adam. The Chinese, in their tradition, place Pankoo long before the time of Fuhe; and yet their account of Fuhe would seem to refer to Pankoo.

The next ruler in order from Fuhe was Shinnoog who taught the people agricultural pursuits. Then came Yu (Noah) and Shun (Shem) about the time of the great flood, who are looked on as two great chiefs, leading the nomadic tribes of the early Chinese, from place to place, wherever they could obtain dry land. It was in this period of the world's history that the great Yu drained the lands, and organized the Chinese into a government which was the beginning of the Hea dynasty. It is uncertain what time after the flood Yu began to reign as the first Emperor of the Chinese, and it is equally uncertain as to where he first located his empire. The establishing of the Hea dynasty must have been about the same time as that of the Egyptian monarchy. Whether the Chinese had any intercourse with the Egyptians at that time, or at any subsequent period, is uncertain; but there is sufficient evidence in the early history of the Chinese to show that they had attained to as high a degree of civilization as the Egyptians. Their laws and customs greatly resemble those of Egypt, and have been handed down to the present generation almost without any change.

Agricultural pursuits have always been in the earliest period been held in high esteem by the Chinese, who commence each opening of spring with a festival in honor of the occasion. At this festival the emperor of the great nation is present, and performs the operation of ploughing and casting seed to encourage his subjects to engage in the cultivation of the soil; and thus the character of the husbandman in China has been and now held in high esteem, ranking above the merchant and soldier. The Egyptians and Grecians had such festivals and religious ceremonies in the spring. In England there used to be what was called the old festival of plough Monday," which was observed on the opening of spring. At that season of the year a plough-light would be set before the patron saint of the village. In China, on that day when this festival is observed, a light is placed before some of their images in temples, and it may be, and I think is, placed before the image of Shinnoong who first taught the Chinese agriculture. This "spring festival" of the Chinese has just been observed. It took place on the fourth of February. On that day, all through the vast empire, a vast procession is formed from every city, headed by the magistrate of the district, and in this procession a buffalo made of paper is carried. It is painted of different colors to represent the kind of weather and prospects for the year, and is typical of agriculture. It was painted green, black, yellow and red. If black predominate, there will be much rain; if green, much sickness; if red (fire), there will be drought; and if yellow (mud), abundant crops. When the ceremony of ploughing is completed, the people set to beating the buffalo until it is torn into strips and each farmer strives to obtain a piece of it.

The making and weaving of silk was introduced about the same time as agriculture, and is ascribed to an empress in the early ages. At a very early age one emperor is said to have been the inventor of writing; another of musical instruments; a third taught men to work in metals; while a fourth is said to have taught men how to build bridges. (See Gen. iv.)

The compass was invented in China at a very early date, and was no doubt originally invented by the Chinese. The Bible speaks of the Egyptians being renowned for their wisdom, and yet they worshipped all manner of idols; and so Chinese, for more than three thousand years, have been worshippers of innumerable idols, and their minds and hearts have been filled with the grossest superstition and atheistical materialism. They have retained no correct idea of God, as a God of infinite holiness, since the time of Noah, when these glorious truths were certainly made known to them. Time has effaced from their minds all recollection of them, and without the divine revelation no reason or earthly wisdom has been sufficient to give them any knowledge of God worthy of his character and perfections. Thus the history of these two ancient nations afford additional testimony to the important truth, that "the world by wisdom knew not God."

The ideas of the great sage, Confucius, concerning the First Cause are very peculiar. He was born about five hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, was a man of remarkable ability, an eminent author and moral philosopher. It is evident from his writings that he had no fixed idea of the true nature of God. He speaks of the First Cause as reason, heaven Supreme Ruler, supreme heaven, and heaven and earth. Confucius and his followers attribute to the word "Taou" the attributes of the one true God. It means doctrine or word, and they speak of it as eternal, unchangeable, creative, omnipresent, and so extensive as to fill the universe, and so small as to be contained in all things, and yet it is not invested with personal properties. The same word in Chinese signifies a way or path, both morally and physically. It also signifies a medium of communication, and it is remarkable that it is so nearly like the properties given by our Saviour to himself: "I am the way, the truth, and the life." "In the beginning was the word."

Taou in Chinese is also used for doctrine, and when thus used is in connection with reason. Confucius represents heaven as an object of supreme veneration, which bestows blessings and inflicts punishment on men. Some of these grand ideas may have been received in the early ages, after the confusion of tongues, from the Israelites, for from the prophecies regarding the land of Shinn would lead us to think they must have known of the existence of the Chinese. During the Shang dynasty seven years of famine prevailed in China, which, in point of time, occurred at the same period as the famine in Egypt, about 1720 B. C. It is also written in Chinese history that the Emperor of China prayed to the Supreme Ruler, and rain fell in torrents.

China was consolidated into a nation, in the feudal form, about the beginning of the Chow dynasty, eleven hundred years before the Christian era. Thus China has existed in the patriarchal form almost from the time of the confusion of tongues, and has had a consolidated government or nationality about three thousand years. Other ancient nations, as Assyria, Babylonia, ancient Egypt, ancient Greece and others, all rose about the same time, flourished for a few centuries, but at length became extinct, and the mouldering ruins of the once great cities of these ancient monarchies alone remain to tell of their departed greatness and glory. But China has stood for forty centuries, and still stands unmoved, having passed through about twenty-nine changes of dynasty, and having had two hundred and forty-one kings and emperors from the beginning to the present time. Her code of laws, formed more than two thousand years since, has scarcely undergone any change and have been carefully revised every few years. Her system of government, her laws, the customs and habits of her people are almost entirely unchanged, and, during the first half of the present century, she has had a much larger population, more wealth, and has been more prosperous than at any time of her long history. China has passed through many revolutions and many changes of rulers; yet she has scarcely changed amid all these. In theory the government of China is despotic; but, practically, it is a democratic form, for by the administration of her laws the equality of all men is acknowledged.

The few nomadic tribes, who left the region of the Tower of Babel, selecting the country near the Caspian Sea as their first home, and after a time going eastward and first occupying the country bordering on the Yellow river, and afterward extending to the low, fertile lands on the great river, Yang-tsz-kiang, have to-day become the most populous empire whose people are gathered under one form of government, and the great city of Peking the oldest capital of any kingdom on earth. When Isaiah prophesied of her conversion to God, she had been in existence fifteen centuries. More than a hundred years before Romulus dreamed of building the great city of Rome, the Chinese were a peaceable, happy and prosperous people. At that time the country was divided into small principalities which were presided over by the nobility; but all were tributary to the chief ruler. The lands were so divided among the people that the ninth division was the property of the State, and was worked and cultivated equally by the owners of the eight divisions, and the proceeds of the ninth division was to sustain the government.

China has truly a wonderful history—a strange people. How strange that so wonderful a people should be without any knowledge of the true God! In their books they often speak of heaven and Supreme Ruler; but they seem to have no correct idea of God. This is a sad thought! They have had great and good men; but they could not tell the people any thing of God, or of the immortality of the soul. They could tell nothing of the life to come, and to this day millions in this great empire are in spiritual darkness not having the light of the gospel of Christ. Pray for them. I will write again about these strange people.

Rev. W. E. M. Linfield, D. D.

IN MEMORIAM.

Rev. William E. M. Linfield, D. D., the only son of William M. and Martha E. Linfield, was born in Charleston, S. C., the twenty-fifth of August, 1825, where he was reared and educated. He died at Hazlehurst, Miss., the sixteenth of March, 1882. His parents came from Scotland. At the age of sixteen he left home and traveled through South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Florida, and was absent about four years. On his return he found no home, for his father and mother were dead, and his only sister had gone to New York with her god-mother. In 1846 he enlisted as a volunteer in the Mexican war, and was in the campaign under Gen. Scott from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico. While lying in his tent, sick of fever, during the encampment of the American army around the capital, he thought, perhaps, his end was near, and he prayed and made a solemn vow to God that, if he would raise him up and spare him to get back to his native land, he would serve him all his days. God heard the prayer and had respect to the vow, and our departed brother was not forgetful of his promise, for though he delayed, he afterward dedicated himself fully to the service of the Lord.

On his return from Mexico he settled in Lauderdale county, Miss., where he taught school and married his wife, Miss Sophronia Jane Barker, in April, 1849. In a few weeks after his marriage he became greatly concerned about religion and joined the church under the Rev. Theophilus Moody. He was not then converted. He already felt the divine call to preach the gospel; but he held back for some time and struggled against the conviction, but finally yielded, and his conversion was one of the brightest and most powerful that was ever witnessed. It may have been the more noticeable because Bro. Linfield had been raised a strict Episcopalian.

Dr. Linfield, in a conversation, once mentioned the following incident; but I am not able to locate it as to time or place. A lady friend felt great interest in his religious condition, and frequently talked to him on the subject until she probably became irksome. He was seated on a piece of lumber cutting a hole through it with a chisel. The lady approached him from behind. He knew her step, and never turned his eye, but pretended to be intent upon his work. There she stood behind him, not speaking a word, but praying and weeping. And while she thus stood he saw the shadow of her tear as it fell to the ground. He dropped his tool and sought a secret place for prayer. That was one of the means which led him to Christ.

In November, after his conversion, he was licensed to preach, and was admitted on trial in the Alabama Conference in 1851. His first appointment was as junior preacher on the Lauderdale circuit. He faithfully and successfully filled some of the hardest and most important charges in the Alabama Conference. His work on the Gastor circuit, Demopolis district, in 1859, will be remembered for long years to come. There were over 600 conversions and accessions to the church under his ministry that year. In 1858 and 1859 he filled Auburn station, and was then transferred to the Louisiana Conference, and 1860 and 1861 filled Baton Rouge station. At the Conference of 1861 he was appointed to Alexandria, where he remained for some time serving the church and superintending the State military school at that place. Those were war times and Conferences were not always held. In November, 1865, he was again appointed to Baton Rouge. In December, 1866, he was transferred to the Mississippi Conference and stationed at Natchez, where he remained two years. In 1869 and 1870 he filled the Vicksburg station; in 1871, the Crystal Springs station; and the three following years he was presiding elder of the Brookhaven district. In 1876 he was on the Jackson district; in 1877 and 1878 he filled Canton station; and in 1879 and 1880 he was on the Brookhaven district. At the Conference in Vicksburg, in 1880, he was granted a superannuated relation. His work was finished. At that Conference we momentarily expected the news of his death. He was already blind. His brain was seriously affected. He, who had thrilled thousands by his lofty eloquence, was now as feeble as a child, and must needs be led about by the hand. He lingered among us, gradually growing worse, until death released him from his sufferings. For some months before he died he was barely conscious of what occurred; only he always understood when prayer was offered, in which he engaged most devoutly. Bro. John A. B. Jones prayed with him the day before he died, and he responded audibly several times, "Amen!" He took no notice of the burning of his house a few weeks before his death; but his heart was stirred by family worship.

As a preacher he had few equals. Occasionally his sermons were obscure. This, when brought to his notice, gave him great pain, for, as he once told the writer, he sought to be plain and direct. But, generally, his sermons were of great power, full of thought, abounding in magnificent passages, and were delivered with great fervor. The pulpit was his throne, and he filled it as few men could. But his lips are sealed. He will answer no more to roll call in our Conference; yet his godly example and his power as a pulpit orator will be felt for many years to come; for "he being dead yet speaketh."

H. F. JOHNSON.

Bring Them to Christ.

MR. EDITOR: It seems as if I must either avoid controversy altogether, or else excite the ire, or, at least, the displeasure of my opponents. Your correspondent, "W. L. C. H.," alludes to my article on "Immigration" in a way which indicates that he feels somewhat offended. No offence was intended. W. L. C. Hunnicutt is my personal friend—a man for whose character I have the highest regard. As an evidence of this it may not be improper to state that, out of nearly a hundred preachers, he was one of four for whom I voted as a delegate to the General Conference. His views on immigration, however, are, I think, very unsound. If I expressed myself very strongly, it was because I felt strongly. I believed, and still believe, that it would be a real godsend to Mississippi, if she could receive a few hundred thousands of the hardy, industrious, thrifty Swedes, Germans and Norwegians, who have contributed so largely to the prosperity of Wisconsin and other Western States. In the intensity of my zeal I may have expressed myself too strongly. A bold, defiant, incisive style is perfectly natural to me in controversy. In debates, in literary societies, I used to give offence unintentionally to those who did not know me well. Allow me to say to Bro. Hunnicutt, that for any thing in either the matter or the spirit of my article, which is offensive to him, I ask his pardon. The relations of amity hitherto existing between us shall never receive an intentional shock at my hands.

With regard to immigration, I wish to preach a very short sermon from a text furnished me by your correspondent, J. B. A. Ahrens: "Immigration saves our missionary treasury much money." Nothing truer than that has appeared in the ADVOCATE in a decade. We seek to convert men not only from Paganism, but also from Romanism. Accordingly we send missionaries not only to China, but also to Mexico, Brazil, and elsewhere. Now, it is a simple undeniable fact that manifold more Catholics are converted to Protestantism by being brought here from Europe and simply turned loose in this Protestant country, than by sending missionaries to Catholic countries. They take in Protestantism by absorption. This is admitted by Catholics themselves.

In 1875 an Irish Archbishop traveled largely in the United States. On his return to Ireland he addressed his people thus: "It is far better for you to live here in poverty and die in the faith, than to go to a country where thousands upon thousands of our Irish race deny the faith." Bishop Reynolds, of Charleston, S. C., writing to an Irish ecclesiastic advised him to "go from parish to parish telling the people not to lose their immortal souls by coming to America." The editor of the Celt is authority for the statement that "the Romish Church loses sixty per cent. of the children of Catholic parents in the United States." "Murray's History of Catholicism in the United States" says: "More Catholics have fallen away from the faith in this country, during the last two centuries and a half, than are to-day living in it." Every now and then one may hear from Protestant lips a lugubrious wail over "the growth of Catholicism." This is nonsense. Catholics themselves admit that their growth does not begin to keep pace with the immigration of Catholics from Europe.

The present membership of the Catholic Church in the United States is a little over 6,000,000. This includes all baptized children. "Murray's History of Catholicism" quotes with approbation an estimate made by the Irish World that "18,000,000 have been lost to Catholicity in the United States." Can all the Protestant Churches of America combined claim such results as this from the labors of their missionaries in Catholic countries? Mark you, these estimates are from Catholics themselves. He knows very little of human nature who supposes that any church will over-estimate its own losses. It may exaggerate its gains, but its losses never. These admissions of Catholics themselves absolutely demonstrate the fact that American Protestantism can not make a better investment of missionary money than by abetting the immigration of European Catholics. I have already shown that a large proportion of the foreign immigrants, now resident in the United States, were members of the Lutheran and other Protestant Churches in Europe. These I presume nobody will be afraid of. It is the importation of Catholics that excites alarm. Now the above admissions of high Catholic authorities ought to put a quietus on all such fears. Let Europeans come, Catholics as well as Protestants. Encourage them to come. But when they are here, instead of ignoring them or loading them with abuse and execration, seek to evangelize them. Employ preachers to preach to them in their native tongue. If necessary, let some of our young preachers study these foreign tongues, and thus prepare themselves for this sort of mission work. Is not the soul of an Irish or French Catholic worth as much as that of a Mexican or Brazilian? Does his soul lose all its value simply because he has come to America? Have we not a vantage-ground from which to present the gospel here that we do not have, and can not have, in any Catholic country? Everybody knows we have. Who does not know that Southern Methodism has received large accessions from this source? The Methodist Episcopal Church has acted wisely. She has not neglected our foreign population. As I have already stated she has nine Annual Conferences among the foreigners in the United States. Whether these people are thriftless, worthless creatures may be learned by consulting their statistics. One item only I mention. They contribute for foreign missions more than $30,000 per annum. Perhaps somebody will say that these figures lie. Well, what the Methodist Episcopal Church has done, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, may do. We may encourage foreigners to come among us. We may give them the gospel with a thousand-fold better return than we have ever had in any foreign field. We may have in the near future not only one, but many Annual Conferences among them—Conferences to which, instead of being for many decades a drain upon our missionary resources, will very soon become contributors to our missionary treasury.

Dr. Ahrens says: "Do not be afraid of the immigrants." Amen, say I. Mississippi needs about a half million of them, and Southern Methodism needs them, while it is equally true that they need us—that is, our gospel. Let them come. Do not be afraid. "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

W. C. BLACK.

The Lord's Day League in New Orleans.

Pursuant to the call of the Provisional Committee of the Lord's Day League, a meeting was held at Grunewald Hall, April 10, at noon, at which were present the clergy of this city and a number of laymen of all religious denominations.

The meeting was called to order by the Rev. Dr. Palmer in the absence of Bishop Keener, who requested the Rev. Dr. Walker to take the chair.

Prayer by the Rev. Dr. Smith.

Dr. Palmer said the Provisional Committee had called this meeting to order for the purpose of permanently organizing the League by the election of officers.

Dr. Palmer said the committee considered it best to take action at once in the election of officers, as, if the same was prolonged, under the general invitation for all who desired to attend the meetings of the League, it might occur, that a mass meeting, instead of a deliberative body, would go into the election.

Dr. Palmer suggested that a committee be appointed to prepare a ticket to be submitted at the present meeting for action, and this suggestion being put in the shape of a motion and unanimously adopted, the chair appointed the Rev. Drs. Smith, Girault, Landrum and Ahrens and the Rev. Messrs. Allen and Johnther as the committee.

On motion of Dr. Smith, the Rev. Drs. Palmer and Hugh Miller Thompson were added to the committee.

The committee then withdrew and in about fifteen minutes returned, the chairman submitting the following ticket as the report of the committee: President, W. R. Lyman; Secretary, Rev. Dr. H. H. Waters; Treasurer, H. V. Ogden.

Executive Committee ex-officio Vice Presidents: B. M. Palmer, D. D.; H. M. Thompson, D. D.; S. Landrum, D. D.; J. B. Walker, D. D.; Hon. Frank McGloin, J. H. Keller, Esq.; Rev. A. M. Green, col.

Dr. Markham moved that the report be accepted and the acceptation thereof be considered as an election. This motion was unanimously carried.

On motion of Dr. Palmer, the thanks of the League were most heartily tendered to Mr. Louis Grunewald for the use of his rooms in the hall during the three meetings, free of charge.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Witherspoon the meeting adjourned, and, with the understanding that the members of the Executive Committee be notified of their election, and requested to assemble in the lecture room of the First Presbyterian Church, Lafayette Square, at half-past seven o'clock on Monday evening next.

Good Words.

Last night I dreamed, as on my bed I lay,
That dismal fear took hold upon my mind;
Swayed wildly by the moaning wintry wind,
The trees were waving in the rain-splashed lane,
And yet upon the curtained window-pane
There was a brightness as of summer day.
Then, hushed as is the land's breeze on the sea,
A gentle whisper, Jesus, came from thee
So I arose and flung the casement wide,
To see whence swept the sweet, faint sounds, and light;
The Lord walked on the road, and aloud I cried,
As he did pass my door into the night,
"Master, where dost thou go? Where wander still?"
And Jesus spake and said, "Against thy will
I can not ope, the bar is on thy side."

—"He said he would, and he will." This was the child's definition of faith in Christ, and is it not both clear and correct? Christ said he would save those who trust in him, and he will. No doubt, no fear, no suspense. He says that he will give grace and glory, and that no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. Yes, reader, he will do as he has promised. "He said he would, and he will."

—What is a Christian? 1. In faith, a believer, Mark xvi, 16. 2. In knowledge, a disciple, John viii, 31. 3. In character, a saint, Rom. i, 7. 4. In influence, a light, Matt. v, 14. 5. In conflict, a soldier, II Tim. ii, 3. 6. In communion, a friend, John xv, 15. 7. In progress, a pilgrim, Heb. xi, 13.

—Justification is the act of God as a Judge; adoption, his act as a Father. By the former we are discharged from condemnation, and accepted as righteous; by the latter we are made the children and heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ forever.—Guyse.

—I know of nothing to give unfailing moral energy to the mind but a living faith in a Being of infinite perfections, who is always with us to aid, strengthen, reward, reprove, chasten and guide to immortality.—W. E. Channing.

—An unbelieving, infidel woman is a monstrosity, considering whether sex owes to Christianity. All other systems keep her in degradation and slavery; many regarding her as without a soul, and without rights much above the brutes.

—Peter's preaching at Pentecost converted thousands; who knows but the simple instrumentality that brought John Bunyan to Christ accomplished as much in the long run?—Morning Star.

—Better fail a thousand times, and in everything else, than attempt to shape for yourself a life without God, without hope in Christ, and without an interest in heaven.

—To love as Christ loved, we must be perfectly content to be misunderstood. If we have sufferings of heart, because others misunderstand us, then we are not dead in Christ.

—God does not forgive because man repents, but man repents because God has forgiven. When taught by the word and Spirit he sees sin as God sees it.

—Religion finds love of happiness and the principle of duty separated in us; and its mission—its masterpiece—is to reunite them.

—As sins proceed they ever multiply; like figures in arithmetic, the last stands for more than all that went before it.

SHINING.

BY FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Are you shining for Jesus, dear one?
You have given your heart to him;
But is the light strong within it,
Or is it but pale and dim?
Can everybody see it,
That Jesus is all to you,
That your love to him is burning
With radiance warm and true?
Is the seal upon your forehead,
So that it must be known
That you are "all for Jesus,"
That your heart is all its own?

Are you shining for Jesus, dear one,
So that the holy light
May enter the hearts of others,
And make them glad and bright?
Have you spoken a word for Jesus,
And told to some around,
Who do not care about him,
What a Saviour you have found?
Have you lifted the lamp for others,
That has guided your own glad feet?
Have you echoed the loving message
That seemed to you so sweet?

Are you shining for Jesus, dear one,
Shining just everywhere,
Not only in easy places,
Not only just here or there,
Shining in happy gatherings,
Where all are loved and known,
Shining where all are strangers,
Shining when quite alone,
Shining at home, and making
True sunshine all around,
Shining abroad and faithful—
Perhaps among faithless found?

Are you shining for Jesus, dear one,
Not for yourself at all?
Not because dear ones, watching,
Would grieve if your lamp should fall?
Shining because you are walking
In the sun's quenchless rays,
And you can not help reflecting
The light on which you gaze?
Shining because attached
So warm and bright above,
That you must let out the gladness,
And you must show forth the love.

Sunday-School Lesson.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1882.—MARK VI. 45-56.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee."—Isaiah xliii, 2.

CHRIST WALKING ON THE SEA.

The miracle of feeding the five thousand was one of the Saviour's most popular miracles. It was the means of gaining for him an immense following. None of the miracles he wrought before this, not even the one he performed at Cana of Galilee, when he made the water wine, brought him so many enthusiastic adherents. The people wanted to make him King. The miraculous multiplication of the barley loaves and the fishes made the people who witnessed it think that, of a truth, this is that prophet and leader of whom Moses spoke when he said that one would be raised up like unto himself. This Jesus had performed a miracle like unto the manna; he had fed this great multitude in the wilderness.

Here was a leader who could furnish, by his productive word and blessing, a vast army. He can lead us, and furnish us. Let us make him our King, and he can lead us to our freedom.

The disciples themselves felt that this was the fortunate occasion for him to assume his kingship. You may imagine the surprise and disappointment of the people and the twelve disciples when the Master, with a stern look of disapproval, and in tones of supreme authority, rejected the offer of the people. The multitude were disappointed at losing such a leader, who could, without a commissariat, supply his army with all they needed, and the disciples were chagrined at the Master's letting slip this opportunity of assuming the place he had come to fill, when it was all but thrust upon him by the people. Their highest conception of his mission was an earthly throne—a deliverer of his people from their tyrannical masters. Jesus ordered them to leave his presence, to go to their boats. He constrained them to leave him. How they hated to leave the Master at this time of his greatest popularity. How they wondered at the Master's strange conduct. Why it was he thus rejected this offer of the people to have him as their King.

They left him crestfallen, and in no good humor at being thus preemptorily ordered away from his presence. They were in disgrace; they had offended their Lord by their evident approval of the people's suggestion. They reluctantly obeyed his order, and, slowly making their way down to the cove where their boat was moored, they hoisted sail preparatory to putting out. They lingered a while, hoping that the Master would yet join them; but dusk coming on, and the Master still delaying, they had to leave without him. Poor, ignorant disciples; they were sense-bound; they had no conception of the spiritual kingdom, made up of souls, which their Master came to set up; they utterly failed to conceive the spiritual nature of his kingdom. They were in trouble; the Master was displeased; they must leave him. They embarked against their will. They were hardly well started before a sudden storm sprang up, beating them out their course, and making it necessary for them to furl sail, and take to their oars, to hold the boat out of the trough of the waves. It was now a fight for their lives; everything was against them; the wind had driven them away off of their course; they were all but exhausted, and despairing almost to the point of despair. Oh! for the presence of the Master. Why did he constrain us to leave? Oh! fearful sailors, his constraining you is the only comfort left you. He it was who ordered you to start; you are in the path of duty, carrying out his command; what ill befalls you, you can lay to his charge. Your own want of faith in him, and appreciation of his work and person, made it necessary for him to dismiss you from his presence, and pass you through an experience like this storm, that you might feel your need of him. A storm at sea when the Saviour was present, though sleeping, had tried their faith; but here is a greater trial of it—a storm and no Saviour. They fail upon the first demand, and they fall here again. Oh! when will you have faith—faith in an absent Lord.

The Master dismissed the multitude, and went up the mountain alone to talk with his Father. He had just witnessed another attempt of the enemy to seduce him from his great work. He felt no temptation to yield; the offer was no new one to him; the kingdoms of this world and their glory had been offered to him before; but his disciples had been sorely tempted. How shall he raise their sordid minds to a true estimate of himself? How develop faith in their souls? From his lonely place of prayer he saw them toiling and rowing. No doubt they were the theme of his talk with his Father. He sees them in their boat, and in his own time starts to their rescue. The night was well-nigh passed, and the storm was raging on. With weary stroke the despairing disciples still toil on to reach the shore. Suddenly their eyes caught a glimpse of a moving spectre—an apparition as of one walking on the sea toward them. At once their souls were filled with undefinable terror—an omen of evil; they see him rising and falling with the roll of the sea, now seen, now unseen, as the lightning flashed and darkness of storm resumed. What awful spectres and apparition strike the soul of the unbelieving in time of trouble! How in times of storms and pestilence are wicked men troubled by the presence of the supernatural. He approaches near, is at the side of the vessel, the boat is passing him in oar's reach, and they scream with terror. Oh! the relief of that voice, those articulate words, distinct above the roar of wind and wave. Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid. It is the I Am, he who made the seas and the winds. He stepped upon the deck. What a revulsion of feeling. What astonishment and wonder seized their souls; "they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered," for they considered not the miracle of the loaves, for their hearts were hardened. What one miracle did not accomplish this last did. Their amazement was at themselves. That they should fail heretofore in comprehending who he was. For faith there must be some such experience like this; where the soul feels its own utter helplessness to save itself from impending doom, the voice is heard, and the revelation is made: it is I. Faith breaks upon the soul only under the conditions of an absent Lord.

We do not pretend to explain this walking on the sea, no more than we do his standing on nothing when he was transfigured on Tabor, or his ascension up into heaven without the aid of wings. The picture of two feet walking on water was an Egyptian sign for an impossible thing, but I have no doubt he walked the sea, stepping from billow to billow, just as I or you have walked across the ridges of a field. This miracle was for the sole purpose of evoking faith in the souls of these men. He will pass us through such a storm.

Los Angeles Conference Correspondence.

MR. EDITOR: We have not so large a working force in this field as we had six years ago when I came to it, but we have a somewhat stronger one. We have grown very slowly in these six years, and are still growing slowly. The cause of this slow growth is the want of money, which means the want of men to properly man the work. With a matchless climate, the richest of soil, and all other natural advantages unsurpassed, the field has been shamefully neglected by the church; our growth, in every particular, has been contemptible, and I see no prospect of improvement. Could we have what Colorado has received from the General Missionary Board, we, too, might present wonderful achievements; but, alas! we have plead for it in vain. We are doing almost nothing in Arizona—a field "white unto the harvest," with but one laborer, and he a local preacher, who does not give all his time to the work. The board will not help us.

Our people have been considerably disturbed during the past two years with an agitation on the vexed question of "Entire Sanctification." A party of ultra Residuists having sprung up among us, carrying away some of our preachers and people, has somewhat retarded our growth, I think.

Notwithstanding all these dark features, the climate is as lovely as ever, the soil as rich, the pumpkins as large, vegetable prodigies as numerous, and society slowly improving. However, this last feature is growing less congenial to us Southerners, from the fact that immigrants from the North are more numerous than from the South; hence society here is rapidly assuming the Yankee hue.

The past winter has been an unusually cool one—I can hardly say cold. The rains have been abundant, although late coming, and crop prospects are magnificent. Summer has come suddenly and gloriously. The thermometer at this time stands at eighty-five; however, this is only pleasant, the dry, pure atmosphere of this climate enabling one to bear a great deal higher temperature than in a more humid clime.

There is now among us quite an agitation on the Sunday law question. Hitherto it has been almost universally ignored. The constitutionality of the law has been denied by the grog-shop party. A test case has gone to the Supreme Court, which affirmed its constitutionality. The better classes of our society are rejoicing, the lower classes threaten rebellion; they have formed a kind of kuklux klan among them, which they misname the League of Freedom. Over five hundred arrests have been made this week in San Francisco for the disregard of law on last Sunday. This league of slavery furnished bonds for all of them. The battle waxes warm; we shall see who conquers.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again.
The eternal years of God are hers,
While error wounded writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshipers."

Will this contest furnish another glorious instance of this grand truth? May the God of our fathers grant it!

Our presiding elder is on a flying visit to our mission stations in Arizona; this is the first visit that part of our territory has had from any member of the Los Angeles Conference for more than four years.

Our delegate to the General Conference leaves for the East next week. I supose he goes thus early that he may visit relatives and friends in Alabama, his native State.

The blending of the Los Angeles Conference with the Pacific has been suggested, and meets with considerable favor. Our want of men and means, and our consequent inability to properly prosecute our work unaided, induces us to favor such a step. The measure has, up to the present time, met with no public expression of opposition. The laity are more anxious for the step, I believe, than are the clergy. Bishops Keener and Kavanaugh have both advised such a course. I believe it the only probable solution of our present difficulty.

Another very important issue is claiming our attention—memorials to the General Conference pleading for such a change of our name as will dispense with the suffix "South," which has proven such a barrier to our success here, are widely circulated on the coast, as well as in Missouri, Kansas, Colorado and Montana. Rev. S. W. DeBusk, of the Denver Conference, says that the suffix constitutes the gravest obstacle in the way to our success in Colorado. The same is true on the Pacific coast. This broad, growing and important part of our connection claims some consideration by the General Conference and the church in general. We ask for the change—the exigencies of all of our missionary and border work demand it.

I have held the position of Sunday-school secretary for several years past, but have signally failed to awaken any particular interest among either preachers or people on the subject. True, we have Sunday-schools wherever we have church buildings, but they are generally dull affairs, a decade or two behind the age. My position is merely a nominal one, there being no provision for traveling through the Conference to stir up any interest on the subject. Last year, prior to our District Conference, I wrote to several of the pastors relative to a Sunday-School Convention in connection with the District Conference, but failed to elicit so much as a single reply. I then presented the question to the District Conference, and it there met with only about three votes, two negative and one (my own) affirmative. I wrote on the subject for the Pacific Methodist, being at that time editorially connected with that paper, but failed to awaken anybody.

Two years ago we tried, i. e., a few of the ladies, to get up some interest on the subject of the woman's missionary movement, but neither the pastors nor the presiding elders would take hold of it, and our efforts proved abortive; the few organized went the way of our two flourishing colleges, over which the Conference fought like children seven years ago—"the way of all the earth"—not "the way our fathers trod."

That great question which is attracting so much attention in Missouri and Colorado, the proposition to establish a church extension system in our church, has scarcely been heard of among us.

With implicit trust in Almighty God, and a wavering faith in the Missionary Board and the General Conference, we await the issues.

Babylon.

In studying the history of this, the greatest and most powerful city in the world, I was much impressed with its grandeur, cruelty, and the desolation with which God has overwhelmed it. For a long time the power of Babylon was wonderful; kingdoms and nations were destroyed by her; but, alas! we now contemplate in her ruins a speaking instance of the vicissitude of human affairs, and a most impressive evidence of the sure fulfillment of prophecies. In the revolution of centuries this great city underwent many changes. It was added to so considerably by Semiramis that she may be, not improperly, called the founder of it. Long afterward it was embellished by Nebuchadnezzar. To these two Babylon was indebted for its greatest improvements and chief splendor.

Nebuchadnezzar the Great, who destroyed Jerusalem, was the most magnificent king of Babylon. He rebuilt the old city, and added another on the outside. When he had fortified the city with walls, and adorned the gates magnificently, he added a new palace to that his father had dwelt in, which was more eminent in height and great splendor. Large and magnificent though it was, it was finished in fifteen days.

Herodotus, who visited Babylon, is the most ancient author who has written upon it. He describes it as fifteen miles square. The walls were built with large brick, cemented with bitumen, and were eighty-seven feet thick and three hundred and fifty feet high. The city was encompassed with a vast ditch, which was filled with water. The earth dug out of this ditch was employed in making the brick for the walls of the city, so that one may judge of its depth and width by the height and thickness of the walls.

There were a hundred gates to the city, twenty-five on each of the four sides. A street answered to each gate, so there were fifty streets cutting each other at right angles. Each street was fifteen miles in length and one hundred and fifty-one feet wide. Four other streets there were, having houses only on one side, the ramparts being on the other, making the whole compass of the city. Each of these streets was two hundred feet wide. The streets of Babylon formed six hundred and seventy-six squares, which were two miles and a quarter in circuit. The houses of those squares were three or four stories high, their fronts adorned with embellishments. Their inner space were courts and gardens. The city was divided by the river Euphrates in two nearly equal parts. The river runs from north to south, and a bridge of admirable structure, seven hundred feet in length and sixty feet wide, formed the communication over the river. The old palace was at one extremity of the bridge on the east side of the river, and the new palace at the western extremity. The temple of Belus occupied an entire square near the old palace. The new palace was adorned by the famous hanging gardens, which are ranked among the wonders of the world. This garden was four hundred feet square, and was comprised of several large terraces, the platform of the highest equalling the walls of Babylon in height. From one terrace to another were stairs ten feet wide. This whole mass was supported by large vaults, built one upon another, and strengthened by a wall twenty-two feet thick, covered with stones, rushes and bitumen, and with plates of lead to prevent leakage. On the highest terrace was an aqueduct, said to be supplied with water from the river by a pump or Persian wheel, from whence the whole garden was watered. The hanging gardens had an area of three and a half acres, on which trees of considerable size were growing. The prospect is said to have been the exact resemblance of a mountainous country. This wonderful garden was undertaken by the king to please his wife, who was a native of Media, and retained strong inclinations for mountains and forests, which abounded in her native country. Under the rule of this great king Babylon reached the summit of her greatness and splendor. She was now the capitol of the civilized world, and into her lap flowed the wealth of almost all known lands, in consequence of which corruptions and licentiousness of manners and morals were carried to a frightful extreme. Those awfully splendid and sublime prophecies of Scripture were fulfilled by Jehovah's vengeance on her crimes. This great capitol was taken by Cyrus, in the dead of night, during the reign of Belshazzar. The king and his nobles were revelling at a splendid entertainment, and the whole city had given themselves up to the riot and debauchery of a grand public festival. Cyrus first turned the river, by means of canals, into the great dry lake west of Babylon, then marched through the emptied channel to the outer walls of the fortified palace, where, finding the brazen gates incautiously left open by the royal guards, while they engaged in carousals, Cyrus entered the city with all his train, and Babylon, as an empire, was no more. No trace of its vast walls are now left, and even its site has been a subject of dispute. It is said: "On its ruins there is not a single tree growing, except an old one, which only makes the desolation more apparent." In Revelation is a description of its fall: "Babylon the Great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." "For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities."

I Think it a Mistake.

MR. EDITOR: Look, if you please, for a moment in one of the April Sunday-School Magazines from Nashville, and notice that our secretary has placed the customary lesson as usual, and then alongside of it the new version of same. Well, I think it is a mistake. The average Sunday-school teacher should not be embarrassed with differing or perhaps conflicting readings. The church for the present preaches from one version. I think one is better than two, and, anyway, I feel sure that "the old is better."

For instance, in our next Sunday's lesson the Jerusalem chamber version leaves out in toto that illustration which we have been taught to consider as inspired, drawn from the well-deserved fate of Sodom and Gomorrah. If that can be left out, or in doubt, or disfigured, why not more, or all?

As a source of information for the student or preacher, or even teacher, if desirous, the new version is of use; but to me it appears as an unnecessary and perhaps dangerous meddling for our Sunday-school text-books to be made the vehicles or arenas of suggestive disputation. See the case, and judge for yourself.

Yours, E. H.

Chickasahay Mission, Mississippi Conference.

MR. EDITOR: I was appointed to the Chickasahay mission, by Bishop Keener, at the last Mississippi Conference, and commenced operations early in January. This is an old missionary field. I have ten appointments, and it keeps me very busy to keep up with them, and bring up the pastoral visiting requisite. We have no parsonage, and, as a consequence, the preacher and family have no permanent home for the year yet, though I have spent the greater part of three months looking for a place to live at. I am truly homesick, though Bro. Breland, one of our hospitable and kind-hearted members, is boarding us at present. Bro. D. S. Williams also boarded us, kindly sharing room with us, and, by the way, Bro. Williams is a Sunday-school man, too.

We are having some accessions on the work; all adult persons. I have been greatly blessed in my private experience this year, notwithstanding the embarrassing surroundings. No permanent home for the year for preacher in charge and family, and $10.47 in money all the quarterage contributed on this mission. Now, sir, what but the religion of Jesus can make a man happy this way. We have many good people here, but we want to abound more and more in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yours in Christ, H. MERCHANT.

SILVER LINE, Miss., March 31, 1882.

The missions of the Church Missionary Society in the very dioceses of India are making fine progress toward independence. The system of native church councils, which we have explained in previous numbers, is admirably adapted to the development of self-reliance. Several have been formed and their annual meetings are an inspiration, both to natives who usually conduct them and to the missionaries who look on. The first meeting of the Bengal Council was held early in the present year. Papers were read on "The development and Direction of Self-Support," which were full of valuable suggestions. The Bishop of the diocese, who presided over the general sessions, cautioned the natives against aiming at independence until they were able to stand alone and recommended due preparation. Mr. Rudra (native) said one of the hindrances was the costliness of the Western methods of maintaining religion.—New York Independent.

Obituaries.

IVY—ALMA IVY, daughter of Rev. J. A. Ivy and Celeste O. Evans of this city, died in Staunton, Va., on Wednesday, March 22, 1882, aged eighteen years.

It has been said, "death loves a shining mark," in this instance it is fully demonstrated. Alma, from early childhood, exhibited those traits which characterized the pure, good and transparently excellent of earth. It may be said of her she was pious from her infancy, loving and obedient as a child, and constant in her devotion to the church and Sunday-school where she was identified as a member and scholar. Alma's consistency of deportment and amiability of disposition won for her many friends. When she died she was a student of the Wesleyan Female Institute, in Staunton, Va. Her mother was unexpectedly summoned to visit her sick and dying child a week or two before her death and there witnessed the last moments of her devoted Alma. She died, as she had lived, a child of God her Saviour.

At the morning session of the St. Charles Avenue M. E. Church, South, Sunday-school, on Sunday, March 26, the superintendent of said school announced the death of Alma, and, after a few remarks in regard to her sudden demise appointed J. D. Parker, Miss Georgie Anderson and her Sunday-school class of young ladies of which Alma was a member, to draft some suitable resolutions to regard to her life and death. The committee prepared the following:

Resolved, That as it hath pleased Almighty God in his unsearchable providence to take out of the world our much-loved young sister and friend, Alma Ivy, we do bow with humble submission to this inscrutable dispensation, feeling that our loss is her eternal gain, and that she now rests in peace with her Saviour and the glorified in heaven.

Resolved, That we shall ever hold sacred the memory of our dear departed young friend, and admire her many virtues.

Resolved, That we tender our heartfelt condolence to the bereaved parents, brothers and sisters.

Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be spread on the Sunday-school minutes, and that a copy of the same be sent to her parents, and to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

J. D. PARKER, for Committee.

FLEMING—Miss LIZZY FLEMING was born in Evergreen, Ala., October 27, 1861, and died in Mobile, Ala., February 15, 1882.

How small a space such a statement covers, and yet how much it means. It means a father's life softened by the touch of infant hands; a mother's heart glowing with pride and gratitude amid the tender palsations of maternity. It means a home made musical with the prattle of childhood's voice and the patter of childish feet. It means the hallowed joy of self-denial and labor that the budding promise of early youth might ripen into a rich maturity. And it means a home darkened with the sorrow of a great bereavement, the withering of cherished hopes whose ashes lie cold to-day upon desolate hearts.

Endowed by nature with a quick and versatile intellect carefully trained, intellectually and religiously, Lizzy gave promise of a bright and useful womanhood. Possessing a sweet and carefully-cultivated voice, an attractive person, a pleasing manner and a joyous disposition, she was the light of her home and the cherished friend of a large circle of acquaintances. She had just left the school-room, and life opened up before her its avenues of happiness and usefulness.

But the hand of an insidious disease stole the bloom from her cheek and the elasticity from her step. Consumption had marked her for its victim; and, with wonderful strength of will, she fought its approach, though the end could not long be delayed. For some weeks before her death she realized her condition, and sought and found peace with God. She talked much of her death, gave minute directions as to her funeral, and exhorted those who wept at her bedside to meet her in heaven.

She asked to live till the roses bloomed; and, when the spring-time air was laden with the perfume of flowers, the weary struggle ended and she fell softly asleep in the triumphant repose of the Christian faith, and we laid her to rest in the hope of immortality. The tender blossoms that withered upon her tomb, with the dew of the morning still fresh upon their petals, were fit emblems of the fresh young life so soon withered by the touch of death. May the faith that sustained her in death sustain in their sorrow the stricken ones that weep over her grave.

J. O. ANDREW.

SHIELDS—WILLIAM SHIELDS was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1808, and died near Greenwood, in Leflore county, Miss., just before one o'clock in the morning, February 26, 1882.

For more than a half-century he was a devoted member and strong support of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, serving her with great acceptability, a greater part of the time, as class leader and steward. His house was the preacher's home. His liberality was proverbial to the needy as well as to the church.

An honored, faithful citizen, his name the synonym of truth and honesty; and although in early life not possessing the advantages of schools, yet being a man of excellent judgment and fine practical sense, his influence and usefulness was manifest wherever he lived. A more kind and affectionate husband and father never lived. In his last illness he suffered in great agony; but he exhibited throughout the most wonderful patience. Yet under all his pain he was mindful of the dear ones around him, and anxious to be of as little trouble as possible. He often expressed the desire to be at rest, praying his heavenly Father (for he remembered "in the day of my trouble I will call upon thee, for thou wilt answer me") to take him to himself. His faith was strong and unwavering in the merits of the blood of the Lamb, and believed with the psalmist: "And I, I shall behold thy face in righteousness."

Suffering could distress, not weaken him. He died, as he had lived, "strong in the faith of glorious immortality beyond the grave." He has left a widow heart-broken (side by side they walked fifty years, sharing mutually their joys and sorrows together) and five children, affectionate and devoted, to mourn his loss. To her and to them what is said but this: "Cast all your cares upon him, for he careth for you;" "He healeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds."

May the Lord bless and comfort the widow and orphans in their great distress, "for vain is the help of man."

F. D. WINFIELD.

HOOVER—Mrs. JANE S. HOOVER, daughter of Thomas Freeman and Jane Sturges, was born in Algiers, La., August 4, 1830, and died in New Orleans, October 10, 1881, aged fifty-one years. She was married to William P. Hoover, October 5, 1848, and was converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1850. She remained faithful to her religious vows, and grew in grace and meetness for the better death. Her mother, long since dead, was a woman of remarkable strength of character and great piety, and Mrs. Hoover followed in her footsteps, and seemed to have inherited her sterling qualities. She was a diligent worker in the church, greatly gifted in prayer, and always in her place at all the public services when never her health and circumstances permitted. She was a most valuable and useful member of the church, and the service of God was her greatest delight. She was faithful in all the relations of life, as daughter, wife and mother, friend and neighbor; and she seemed to have followed Christ fully, and to have served God with a perfect heart and a willing mind. She died well. For months she was a great sufferer, but she endured as seeing him who is invisible," and she met death with perfect composure and peace, and unfaltering trust in Christ. The writer knew her long and well, and ever held her in the highest esteem as an exemplary and devoted child of God. May the blessings of her God rest upon the bereaved husband and children.

LINUS PARKER.

WALSH—Died in Newark, New Jersey, March 31, 1882, Mrs. ELIZABETH WALSH, an elect lady, who like the first Elizabeth, of whom, we may be said, "walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, blameless." His word was a lamp unto her feet and a guide unto her path. By its light, duty to all in distress within the sphere of her influence, became paramount to all other considerations, and many deeds of charity, love and kindness were ostentatiously performed.

It was her privilege to claim that she was born in the lap of Methodism, and early indoctrinated in its pectiar tenets. Her father's house was a home for the preachers. Men, who like Paul, worked with their own hands for their support, while day and night, for the benefit of others, they made the word of God their constant study. No wonder that from these vivid impressions the sacred page had taken so deep a root that its language was for her the usual expression of thought, and educated her so eminently for the position she long held as teacher of a Bible class for young ladies, who owe to her faithful instruction their first knowledge and their present enjoyment of the comforting truths of Christianity. This lady was a faithful wife, a devoted mother and a kind friend. Affable at all times, she was ever flowing with a genial humor which was irresistible in its effects. Dear sister, our parting is not long because it is not final.

HOWIE—Mrs. MARGARET HOWIE, daughter of John and Anna Houston, was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., on the twenty-sixth day of November, 1800, and died, near Bolton, Miss., March 16, 1882, in the advanced age of eighty-one years and three months. At the age of twenty-two years she removed to Alabama, in which State she was married to Mr. John Howie about three years later. With him she walked life's pathway peacefully for more than thirty years. He was a steward and class leader in our church for very many years; dying in the faith about twenty-five years ago in Smith county, Miss., for to this State they had removed in middle life. Sister Howie herself joined our church early in life, and for many years rejoiced in the blessings of a conscious peace with God. At times her joy was unspeakable and found expression in shouts of glory. This was not uncommon at the fireside. Of a delicate constitution her physical powers gave nearly down some years ago, and with this feebleness of body came also comparative weakness of mind. But she never cast away "the confidence that hath great recompense." To this she adhered, faithfully lived and quietly passed away. In the last days she found a congenial home with her daughter, Mrs. Porter, of Hinds county, Miss. Other children and grandchildren numerous, with several of the fourth generation, lived near by to visit and be visited by her while she tabernacled here. May all these meet her in that far better country.

J. P. ISAKE.

KING—Mrs. JANE ELVIRA KING, nee Finly, was born at Pendleton's Courthouse, S. C., March 9, 1808, and passed away from earth to her loved home, March 22, 1882. She was united in marriage to Mr. Peyton King, at Elyton, Jefferson county, Ala., where she lived a number of years, removing from there to Pickens county, Ala., where she resided twenty years. At the time of her death she was living in the home of her only living child, Mr. Sidney King, a few miles southwest of Meridian, Miss. She lingered long on the stormy shores of time, and in age and feebleness, having passed her "three-score years and ten" by four years and two days, she "fell asleep" and rests. Oh, what rest! sweet rest! Funeral services were conducted at Sageville Church, near which she was buried, by Rev. J. A. Godfrey, assisted by the writer. A mother has gone, and though only one suffers this loss, yet she is a sad loss to him. But, my brother, remember your loss is her gain. Her husband preceded her about ten years. May we meet her in heaven.

CATO—LEWIS CAPERS CATO, son of Henry and Rebecca Cato, was born in Copiah county, Miss., in 1859; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1870, at Bethel Church, Scotland circuit, Mississippi Conference; and died November 19, 1881, of typhoid fever, after a lingering illness. He was trained in the usages and doctrines of the Methodist Church, and had he lived would, doubtless, have made a useful member. He leaves a disconsolate wife to whom he was much attached. May Heaven comfort her; and may the distressed parents, who weep for their noble boy, trust in him who does all things well—even in taking away our loved ones. We trust to find a resting-place in the blessed home of the people of God.

J. R. S.

MYERS—ANDREW H. MYERS, son of Jacob S. and Malinda L. Myers, was born May 4, 1856, and died at Greenville, Miss., January 29, 1882.

He was a steady young man, and his death has carried sorrow not only to his father's family, but also to a number of friends.

TELL IT.

BY W. B. GALLAHER.

Tell it, tell it far abroad,
Wide as air,
That the weary find sweet rest,
"Over there;"

Rest indifferably glad,
Glorious;
Rest most balmy, beautiful,
Victorious.

Tell it, tell it up and down
All the earth,
Heaven is nearer hearts of pain,
Than of mirth;

And the light in God's great house,
Brightest burns,
For the weeping wanderer,
Who returns.

Tell it ever such is God's
Deathless love,
Pilgrims with bruised, bleeding feet,
Find above.

Joy and glory grand, supreme,
Thorn and stone,
Exchanging for the wealth of Crown and throne.

Notes of Life.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

In going from McGee's to Huntsville, the year 1819, on my circuit work, and just as I came opposite the Green Bottom Inn, I heard a great shout, and looking to the left saw an immense throng of highly excited people, and at a glance perceived horses dash off in the direction I was traveling. It flashed upon me that it was the celebrated race-track where the sportsmen of Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Alabama annually tested the speed and mettle of their high-blooded horses. The hill, houses, and stages were crowded, and such cheering and prolonged hurras had rarely been heard. In a moment the words, "Mine eyes shall not look on vanity," occurred to me, and although the swift coursers in making the circle ran so near me that I could hear the clatter of their feet and the breathing of the panting and struggling riders, I kept steadily on my way without pausing or stealing a glance at them.

Is it asked what harm it would have been if I had done otherwise? Would it have been sinful? Is racing a sin? I do not say that running, or simple racing, is a sin, or that looking at a race is of itself such, especially if it be accidental; but I do unequivocally say that the race-course is the theater where some of the worst kinds of gambling is carried, and then all abettors of it are practically contributing to debauch the sentiment. Bets are often made by friends of speed a year or more in advance; the mind, heart, and body are occupied and engrossed. I have known sportsmen, while with heavy bets pending and horses in training for the struggle contest, to become religiously impressed; but few of them have yielded. The very fact that they had committed themselves to a race for a large sum utterly discouraged all serious efforts. The excitement continues so long, the associations and fascinations are so dangerous, and the temptations to other and kindred vices so strong, that the life of the sportsman is like riding by moonlight over a bridge of holes; where one crosses safely a hundred fall through. Grant something may be true which is claimed for it as to improving certain qualities of the horse, the employment it gives to many, the people it brings to the hotel and public carrier interests, and the recreation it affords to the masses who attend, backed and countenanced by legislators, judges, the queens of beauty and fashion, and wealth, from the Empress to the canaille—still, candor compels the verdict that the evil infinitely transcends the benefit. The benefit is largely imaginary, the evil real and farreaching. The gambling, like the drinking proclivity, is a morally unhealthy one, needing restraint the more because it originates in a perverted and depraved appetite. Whether we regard the Kings of the turf, the influence they generally exercise over their own families, especially their sons and sons-in-law, over their associates, retainers, trainers, stable-boys, and the long retinue of flatterers, loafers, and worn-out specimens of humanity; the diversion of sisters adverse to piety, purity, and intellectual culture, leaving out of view the pecuniary investment in it, and which cannot be readily turned into other and useful enterprises without heavy loss—all and more, unite to condemn the race-track as exceptionally objectionable—a gigantic gamble. Under the most favorable surroundings it works evil. The detitious importance it confers upon the least valuable quality of the horse is overwhelmingly counterbalanced by its degrading effects upon the noblest attributes of manhood. And this applies alike to aristocratic Kentucky Derby and the quarter-mile exercise-race at the dilapidated village for a quart of contraband whisky, with the exception that the former is large in proportion to its assumed character respectability. Imagine a racing clergyman preaching on Sunday to an audience he has been meeting the entire week previously on the race-track! Is he not beset with the echoes of the shouts, the ribald profanity, and drunken craziness of his associates, even when, in soft tones of mock penitence, he distributes among the sacred symbols of the last supper, and when renouncing "the devil and all his works," the vain pomp and glory of the world, and vowing not to follow or be led by them?" Can not the actors in this scene laugh in each other's faces, the first time they meet afterward, at the remembrance of their sublime impudence? Is this Christian-Broad-church Christian-Liberal enough for the Roman soldier who gambled for Christ's vesture at the foot of his cross, and broad enough for the rich man who went to hell?

But what of dancing and the theater? Does the church prohibit its members from these amusements? Certainly not. Social and innocent amusements often be needed, and are proper. Our Heavenly Father does not stint us. He is profuse. All paradise was given us, one reservation. That was a test of love. The only thing prohibited was a thing not necessary to existence, to happiness, or the highest end of life. Of every thing else they might freely and truly partake. The new—"good, very good"—world, with all its beauty, sublimity, and staliness, lay before them, the free gift and pledge of their great Father's love. It was theirs to have, to hold, and enjoy. With all this was the beatowment of attributes adapting them perfectly to understand and enjoy their munificent surroundings. Within the vast circumference of these various pursuits and pleasures all was natural and innocent; but, as every gift carries with it an obligation, and every law implies and involves duties to be enforced by penalty, so, as a recognition of this universal principle, a prohibition was announced as a test of love and fealty, to disregard which is sin. It matters not what that duty or lost may be, if the Supreme Lawgiver authoritatively imposes it as such, it is sin to disregard it. The simpler and easier the condition, the less is the excuse and greater the sin of its violation. The magnitude of the offense is determined by the authority of the law. The inspired oracles denounce "revelings, banqueting," "the lusts of the flesh and of the eye, and the pride of life;" it demands bearing the cross, self-denial, humility, and to do "whatever we do to the glory of God." While neither the Bible nor the church prescribes specifically and by name every duty or denounces every error, resolving and comprehending many of them in great principles, the distinctions are so clear and plainly laid down as to be apparent to the discernment of the spiritually-minded inquirer. It is not dancing for health or recreation, nor dancing in the abstract—if there be such—but dancing in the concrete, promiscuous of the sexes, in close contact; the familiar handling, dangling, caressing, the indelicate posturing, the personal liberty taken and submitted to as naturally understood in the programme of the dance-room—all these kept up to the "wee hours of the night"—it is these and the like, which go to condemn these orgies as injurious to health, and inconsistent with refined feminine sensibility, and to the genius of Christianity.

It is not assumed that there are not greater evils than dancing, or that some who oppose it may not have "a beam" who find a "mote;" nor is it denied that young and timid ladies, who find themselves unexpectedly in a parlor where they must join in a dance, or be the "wall-flowers" of the circle, reluctantly, and from a want of moral courage, yield to temptation. They are perhaps as much to be pitied as blamed for the first offense; but if they freely, and from love of it, persist against persuasion, remonstrance, and repeated pastoral warning, and reasonable waiting for reflection, the result seems inevitable—the formal relation dissolved as the spiritual has already been. Whoever loves worldly pleasures more than Christ is no Christian, and the fashionable dance, and the delight in it, as clearly discriminates between the "flesh and the spirit, as anything I know of. The church, following the Master, has prohibited it. Every Christian denomination in the country, through its highest officials, has condemned it; and if they have failed to conform their judicial acts to their protests, we may regret it, but cannot imitate them. As Methodists we may not always have been blameless, but I think I can safely say that horse-racing, the liquor traffic, theater going, and dancing—all which belong to the same category—when properly dealt with, will dissolve church-membership when properly brought into the church court.

In this exercise of official duty it is especially proper there be no rash, nasty, or, injudicious action. While we dare not silently see the church lapse into worldliness without trying to prevent it, we cannot afford to diminish our influence as under-shepards of a gentle and loving Chief Pastor.

To all this it may be said the tendency of the time is drifting the church into the world; and it cannot be prevented. So much greater is the necessity to resist it now, before it is too late. What surprises me most is that our members need restraint in these things. After my conversion I had no taste for them. Love and gratitude for my Lord cured me for life of the desire for sinful and doubtful amusements. A thorough change of heart ought to do this.

MISSIONARY.

WEST CHINA.—Rev. L. N. Wheeler, D. D., who is pioneering our West China mission enterprise, reports his arrival at Tchang, a town on the Yangtse in the province of Hupeh, but not far from the borders of Sechuera, on January 7. This was one month after leaving Hankow. The journey was made in a leisurely manner for purposes of observation. Dr. Wheeler writes: "Over six weeks on this magnificent river since leaving home have given me a somewhat trying but very interesting experience—especially the four weeks from Hankow in a native boat. Frequent visits to the shore and continual and close observation of junkmen have confirmed the impression that both the need and the opportunity of missionary work present this whole region as a most inviting field to the pioneers of evangelism in China. We have passed through a fertile and populous section of the empire lying outside of all existing plans of missionary societies. But when once the great west has been occupied, that section will begin to feel the influence of an aggressive gospel coming up the river and descending with the floods." Dr. Wheeler is inclined to advise the establishment of an intermediate station at Tchang, for various reasons. There is every opportunity there for the study of Western Mandarin, the language of Szu-chuan, which differs considerably from the Mandarin dialect of Kinkiang. It more nearly approaches the Nankingese which Mr. Lewis has an excellent opportunity of learning at Chinkiang by the employment of a Nanking teacher.—Mission Rooms, Methodist Episcopal Church.

A YEAR OF WORK IN JAPAN.—A correspondent writes: From the statistics for the last year's work in Japan I gather the following, which will interest your readers, I doubt not: The earliest mission work in Japan was begun in 1859; though it has only been within the last ten years that the work has been at all extended. There are now married male missionaries, 78; unmarried male missionaries, 19; unmarried female missionaries, 48; total, 136; stations, 35; out-stations, 81; organized churches, 70; self-supporting churches, 14; partially self-supporting churches, 58; adult converts, 3,108; boys' schools and mixed schools, 35; scholars in these, 1,513; girls' schools, 16; scholars, 573; theological schools (three are union) 6; theological students, 97; Sunday-schools, 90; Sunday-school scholars, 3,721; ordained native pastors, 37; unordained native preachers and catechists, 116; contributions of native Christians, 8,531 yen (a yen is the paper dollar); Bible societies, 3; sold, Bibles, New Testaments and portions, copies, 115,000; including pages, 18,000,000. For these the Japanese have paid 16,000 yen! Is not this a wonderful work? Does not that last item betoken a religious revolution? Can a heathen people care for sixteen thousand dollars' worth of Scriptures and care enough to buy that much without being on the eve of casting off the old faith in Buddhism or Shintoism for the new faith of Christianity? A working-man's wages out here are from twenty-five to fifty cents a day, so that sixteen thousand yen is equivalent to a much larger sum in the States.—Christian Union.

A HOSPITAL AT YANG CHOW.—It will be remembered that this large city has been visited by Rev. M. L. Taft from Chinkiang. We are interested to learn that Dr. Edward P. McFarlane, who for some time had charge of the Church Union Hospital at Hang Chow, is proposing to establish a hospital for the victims of opium-smoking, with a general dispensary and surgical department, at Yang Chow. In a letter to Mr. Taft he details many of the advantages of this work for evangelistic purposes. The charitable attempt thus made to cure the opium habit shows to the Chinaman that there is no connection between Christian missions and the opium trade; it is rather a silent protest against it. The opium patients are required to attend the Christian services connected with the hospital. All opium smokers can be cured in four weeks. During this time an intelligent Chinaman can learn the fundamental principles of the gospel. A suitable hospital can be sustained at Yang Chow for $350 a year.—Zion's Herald.

—The nominal Christian communions of Turkey can give a great deal of trouble to members who attend Protestant services when they are so minded. Mr. Jenney, of Monastir, European Turkey, a missionary of the American Board, gives a case in point. At Strumnitza, a city a hundred miles from Monastir, a man named Tunne had attended Protestant services; whereupon the Greek Bishop sent for him and told him that his wife demanded a divorce because he no longer attended the Orthodox Church. The Bishop had previously announced that he would grant a divorce to any one whose husband or wife attended Protestant meetings. Tanne renounced the church, whereupon the Bishop tried to strike him and had him shut up in jail. After much delay, his release was obtained; but he is to be tried on a charge of cursing the Bishop's hat and beard. Mr. Jenney says the people throughout Macedonia seem to be ready for the gospel.—New York Independent.

—The committee of the General Christian Missionary Convention has undertaken to build, in connection with the congregation of the church, a church-building, to cost not less than $35,000, for the church of the disciples of Christ, in Washington, at which President Garfield was a worshiper. The title of the property is to be so guarded that it shall always be under the control ultimately of the Missionary Convention.

BULGARIA.—The boys' school has opened successfully at Tirnova. Eleven young men are studying there; "all fine fellows," writes the missionary. Nine of them are preparing for our mission work. A brighter day is evidently dawning for our mission in this country. The press expected at Tirnova has arrived. Mr. Jones "means to make it talk."

ANOTHER GIFT.—The late Rev. Alexander H. Vinton, D. D., of Boston, bequeathed $5,000 to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church, and to the Society for the relief of aged and infirm clergymen in the diocese of Connecticut whatever sum shall be realized from his life insurance.

—The Posterlands Society of Sweden is one of the useful missionary organizations in Europe. It was founded in 1856. Count Wrangel as its president, and it has a flourishing seminary for the training of missionaries near Stockholm. The missions of the society are chiefly in Africa and India.

—The American Missionary Association held its thirty-fifth annual meeting in Worcester, Mass., last week. Its income for the year was $243,795, being $56,315 more than that for the previous year. It needs $300,000 for current expenses the coming year.

—The Jewish Intelligencer says that in a town in Persia (Hamadan) recently forty Jews and fifteen Jewesses have been brought to believe in Jesus by reading the word of God alone.

ONE MORE.—A new Missionary Society, called the Evangelical Association on behalf of the German Protestants in America, has been formed at Barmen, Germany.

—During the spring months of the present year, two Presbyterian missionaries, Messrs. Levenberger and Corbett, baptized two hundred and fifty Chinese in the villages of the province of Shanting.

—Mr. Anet says that Belgium is more open to evangelical influences now than for a long time past. The people are disgusted with the Roman Catholic priests, and are turning to Protestantism.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dr. Kennedy, of the Free Church, sometimes called the "Pope of the Highlands," has issued a document taking position strongly against the movement led by Drs. Rainy and Adams for disestablishment of the Kirk. He argues that the movement, while inconsistent with the engagements of Free Churchmen, springs from no creditable source; that the present duty of Free Churchmen is to hold to their disruption ground, "aloof as yet from the existing Establishment, but striving to secure for Scotland the blessing of a rightly constituted and healthily-conditioned Established Church;" and that this is very specially the duty of all in the Highlands connected with the Free Church, whom he urges, as forming nine-tenths of the population in the Northern Highlands to demand from the Government the endowments of which they were, as he contends, wrongfully deprived at the Disruption.—New York Independent.

The business meeting of the English Congregational Union was one of the longest and most exciting ever held. The election for chairman for 1882 took place, with the result already announced, Dr. Parker being defeated by Mr. McLaveden, by a vote of 725 to 479. While the vote was being counted a resolution moved by Mr. Stallman was being discussed. It proposed to do away with the present system of nominating the chairman and elect him in open assembly, the four names having the highest number of votes to be read out and the selection to be made by ballot from this number. The debate was exciting, after which the resolution was carried by a large majority. The subject of Dr. Allon's address as chairman was "Congregationalism."

—The General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church, the eight of the series, has been in session in New York City, beginning last May. Six bishops, twenty-seven presbyters, and thirty lay deputies were in attendance. It was moved that an article declaring belief in everlasting punishment in hell of the wicked condemned by Christ be added to articles of religion. A contest occurred over the motion to refer. It was finally referred, after a motion to lay it on the table had failed.

—The General Conference of the United Brethren in Christ has re-elected for the ensuing four years Bishops Glossbrenner, Weaver, Dickson, and Castle, and chosen E. B. Kephart to the same office. W. J. Shuey was elected publishing agent; J. W. Hott, editor of the Religious Telescope; and D. K. Flickinger, missionary Secretary. The publishing agent's report indicated great prosperity in the book business. The net profits the past four years were $48,197. Last year they were $18,120, and in 1878, $5,691.

—The General Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States (German) met in Tiffin, O., May 18, in triennial session. Jeremiah H. Good, D. D., of Ohio, was chosen president. The report of the Peace Commission appointed to harmonize the two parties in the church, was unanimously adopted, after a temperate discussion.

—At eleven o'clock on Thanksgiving Day a carriage drove up to St. Luke's African Church, in Washington, and President Arthur and Mrs. Secretary Hunt alighted, and were at once shown to a pew near the chancel. The President remained during the entire service, and joined in the responses as earnestly as if he had been seated in his own pew at St. John's.

—The American Unitarian Association reports receipts for the year of $128,803, and a balance of nearly $5,000 on hand. Of the $123,642 expended $56,144 was invested. —The Canada Methodist General Conference has sanctioned the formation of a Woman's Female Missionary Society, and the matter is now being agitated in the different conferences. Last year the Montreal ladies made a beginning; also the ladies of Hamilton, with Mrs. Dr. Burns, president. This year a beginning has been made at Brantford.

—The Old Catholics of Austria have been sorely disappointed in the answer of the government to their request for state aid. The petition was denied on the ground that the Old Catholics had completely broken with the Catholic Church, though their clergy could, nevertheless, be excommunicated by the Roman Catholic Bishops.

A KITCHEN TRAGEDY.

BY EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

Lightfoot in his castle,
Just behind the wall,
Creeps along his stairway,
Through his winding hall;
Sneaking to his doorway,
With a noiseless tread,
Waits to hear the sleepy cook
Creaking off to bed.

Whitefoot on her cushion,
By the kitchen fire,
Dreams of dainty dinners,
Such as cats desire:
Cakes and cream and chicken,
Gravy, rich and nice,
Platters filled with speckled fish,
Plump and tender mice.

Lightfoot from his castle
Saunters quite at ease,
Tastes the golden butter,
Nibbles at the cheese,
Finds the jelly toothsome,
Thinks the pies are fine,
Says, "I'll call my little wife
She and I will dine."

Whitefoot moves a whisker,
Pricks a velvet ear:
Who would guess the sleepy thing
Such soft steps could hear?
"Quick!" there's not a soul awake
In the silent house!
No one knows that in the night
Puss has caught a mouse!

—Our Little Ones.

Letter to Olive Calhoun.

DEAR LITTLE FRIEND: Though I never saw you, I love you very much; for some one told me that you said you "looked and looked for her pieces in the ADVOCATE every week, and papa told me it would come next week, but it didn't come." I have "come" now. Are you glad? Yes, I know you are. I imagine I see your bright eyes and smiling face as you read this letter. You "looked and looked every week," and every week were disappointed, and that was so hard for you, but I hope you did not lose your faith in me.

Sometimes our loving Father permits even us big people to be disappointed, so that we may be tried and purified by our disappointments in life.

If we all had all we look for all the time, we might not be as thankful as we ought to be for what we do have. We must not lose our hope and courage if a log or stone blocks up the way, but climb over it and go on. And now, my little friend, suppose you look around for something to do, and call all your little friends together, and start a "Mite Society," and send your mites to our good editor for Miss Charlotte Hallaran's Mexican mission school.

Will you try? I know that Ida, Edna, Cammie, Zulu, Ernest, Jammie, and all your little friends would join you in this grand enterprise. Asking "Our Father" to bless you and all "our young people." Truly yours,

AUNT LORETTA.

Chickens for Mexico.

MR. EDITOR: In response to the suggestion of Annie and Olive Secrest, published in the ADVOCATE several months ago, and also to that of "Emma," of Yazoo county, Miss., of later date, I have this to say: Our little Bennie, who is too young to write his own letters, has a beautiful coal-black hen which was a present, and which we propose to call his missionary hen. She has just hatched a drove of lovely chickens, all black but one—and it is pure white. I promise to look after these little chicks carefully, and as many of them as I raise shall be sold, and the money forwarded to you, to aid in building a school-house for Miss Charlotte Hallaran, in the city of Mexico. Of course it will be some time before the money can be sent, but I thought Emma's suggestion a good one, for all the little folks who intended trying to make some money, to write and let it be known to encourage others. Yours truly,

MARY J. PARKER.

CLINTON, LA., March 31, 1882.

Elephants and their Ways.

Twice around an elephant's fore-foot gives his height to within an inch or two. As regards age, looking to their peculiar dentition and other circumstances, Mr. Sanderson thinks it by no means improbable that elephants live to 150 or 200 years. No one has ever, apparently, seen the remains of a dead elephant, and this circumstance is so marked as to have given rise to the belief among some wild tribes that wild elephants never die; whilst others believe that there is a place unseen by human eye to which they retire to end their days. In Mr. Sanderson's wanderings for years through elephant jungles he has not only never seen the remains of an elephant that had died a natural death, but he has never met any one among the jungle tribes or professional hunters who had. The Cingalese have a superstition that on feeling the approach of dissolution the elephant retires to a solitary valley and there resigns himself to death. There is a similar belief in India, but Mr. Sanderson shows that it is untenable.

One would not expect to hear that elephants are expert swimmers, though they can no more jump a trench eight feet wide than they can dance a hornpipe. Such, however, seems to be the case, from the fact that large numbers of them are annually sent across the tideway of the Ganges between Dacca and Barrackpore, and are sometimes six consecutive hours without touching the bottom. Mr. Sanderson has seen an elephant swim a river three hundred yards wide with his hind legs tied together. They are sometimes drowned, apparently by being attacked with cramps or with a fit.

The belief that wild elephants have decreased in India is shown by Mr. Sanderson to be incorrect. The records of the past fifty years attest that there is no diminution in the numbers now obtainable in Bengal, whilst in southern India elephants have become so numerous of late years that they are annually appearing in places where they have never been heard of before. In fact, Mr. Sanderson thinks that unless something be done, the rifle will have to be used to protect the roots or tracts bordering upon elephant jungles. To give an idea of the number of wild elephants in some parts of India, the lecturer stated that during the past three years five hundred and three elephants have been captured by the Deeca Khedah establishment in a tract of country forty miles long by twenty broad in the Garo hills, whilst not less than one thousand were met with during the hunting operations.

The lecturer gave a graphic description of the different modes of capturing and training the elephant. Here is an extract: "When an elephant chases the men they betake themselves to the shelter of tree-trunks, bamboo-clumps or long grass, and it is astonishing to see how they frequently escape uninjured. I have known many cases of men standing against a tree or hiding in tufts of long grass within a couple of yards of elephants that were passing in indecision without being discovered, though the elephants were evidently aware of their close proximity, as they kicked up the ground in anger and then made off. In such cases the slightest movement would have led to the hunters being instantly trampled to death. Men are frequently killed, of course, but they are almost always young hands who are learning. I saw one shell make a narrow escape a few months ago. He ran from an elephant and climbed a tree; the elephant butted the trunk and the man fell down, but his pursuer was so astonished at the sight that she fled at once. Sometimes drives are conducted by torch-light, and these seldom fail, owing to the elephants' fear of fire. The scenes on these occasions are exciting beyond description."—London Globe.

The Floating Homes of Bangkok.

Boats are the universal means of conveyance and communication, and a boat thus becomes a necessary adjunct of every person's household. To its dextrous use, every child is trained. Men, women and children are equally accustomed. Perhaps the most common form is a stout skiff about twenty-five feet long, turning up very shapely and high behind, like a Venetian gondola. It is broad in the beam, and two-thirds of its length it is housed over, leaving a little flat deck in front and a still smaller one behind. Behind stands the husband, and sculls. In front stands the wife, rowing and using a boat-hook to help their way through the crowds. The front of the boat is used for business, passengers, or cargo. The rear third is given up to family and domestic furniture.

For, incredible as it may seem, we soon see that each boat is the home of a family, father, mother, girls, and boys, who are born there, live there, and die there. In the day time, the children and the furniture are crowded into a space not over four feet square; at night, they can spread out over greater surface. I looked into these homes with attention, and never could enough wonder or admire how closely all was packed, without seeming to hustle or painfully crowd. Also that the children lived so happily and contentedly in a space no greater than a large-sized Saratoga trunk! It is probably a fact that there are many ten-year-old children in Bangkok river who have never walked over twenty feet in a straight line—in short, who have never been on land. But then, when they come in proximity to boats whose little inmates they know, they would—boys and girls from five to twelve—jump out of their boat-house, and dive and swim away to visit and gambol around together, now free in the water, now hanging to the boat's side or setting astride of the scull oar. And a friend tells me that he has seen them in their visits take with them baby, to whose shoulders mother has prudently attached a hollow gourd or other light float to insure its safety.

In a minor excursion up a side canal, I found myself at the city residence of the prime minister, whose name I have not now time to write out in full. I ran my boat all round through his pleasure grounds, and wondered whether the worthy old gentleman considered that he was living on land or in the river. In one part of his aquatic elysium, I saw magnificent specimens of the Victoria regia, whose leaves, round like a platter, were over two yards in diameter. Their rim was sharply turned up in a ledge an inch high, and on the raft thus formed were settled, quite at home like, a family of frogs. They, too, seemed to fall in with the manners of the country.—Rochester Democrat.

A WEASEL'S WIT.—A man in California, who had been greatly troubled by rats in his barn, found them gradually disappearing, and was puzzled how to account for it. The mystery was explained when he found a very wide-awake weasel which was engaged at the time in a vigorous combat with an unusually large-sized rat.

The latter proved too much for his adversary, and finally chased his weaselship out of the barn. A few mornings later, the gentleman found the same animals engaged in a similar battle.

The weasel at last ran away, as before, and the rat followed in hot pursuit. This time, however, the weasel ran into a hole it had burrowed through a pile of hardened compost. This hole was large at the entrance, but the outlet was scarcely large enough to admit the passage of the weasel's body.

The weasel darted into the hole, with the rat at his heels. A moment later the weasel emerged from the other side, ran quickly around the compost pile, and again entered the hole, this time in the enemy's rear.

The gentleman, interested in the proceedings, watched the place some time, and found that only the weasel came out.

Digging into the compost, he found the rat quite dead and partly eaten. The weasel had arranged his trap so that the rat could enter, but, becoming closely wedged in the narrow portion of the hole, could be attacked at a disadvantage and be easily killed.

A little boy was tempted to pluck some cherries from a tree which his father had forbidden him to touch.

"You need not be afraid," said his evil companion, "for if your father should find it out, he is too good to hurt you."

"Yes," said the brave little fellow, "I know that, and it's the very reason why I won't take any. He wouldn't hurt me, but it would hurt him to know I didn't mind him."

Our Church Name.

Some of our brethren on the border, and in other sections, are in favor of changing the name of our church. The General Conference of 1866 sent the question around to the Annual Conferences, and it was rejected by a decided vote. At the General Conference at Atlanta the matter was referred to a special committee, composed of O. P. Fitzgerald, W. M. Rush, R. Alexander, A. W. Wilson, Andrew Hunter, C. Murchison, A. S. Andrews, R. K. Hargrove, R. S. Finley, E. E. Wiley, C. D. Oliver, H. F. Johnson and O. A. Darby. The report of this committee, adopted, we believe, without dissent, and, at any rate, by a large majority, was as follows:

"Your committee on the change of the name of the church, to whom was referred a memorial from the Holston Conference and other papers relating to that subject, have carefully considered the matter and submit the following report:

"The time for such change, if it ever existed, is now past. The masses of our people are satisfied equally with the doctrines and polity of the church, and the name under which it has made a history of which it has no cause to be ashamed. Even on the border and the Pacific coast, where it was supposed the desire for a change of name was strongest, and the consequent benefits would be greatest, our people are divided in opinion with an increasing sentiment against any change. The passions and prejudices which formerly led to misjudgment concerning the spirit and purposes of our church are happily subsiding. Sectionalism has had its day in Church and State. Sectional catch words have lost their power. Geographical lines can not be abolished, they were made by the hand of God. Their political significance in the church can be abolished, and under the guidance of an unerring Providence, and the inspiration of the Spirit of grace, we may soon hope for this happy consummation. Under our church name as it stands, gratifying progress has been made toward the establishment of fraternal relations with the Methodist leading bodies of the world. If the geographical suffix to our name is a bar to fraternal recognition of us on the part of any, the fact furnishes a reason why they should pray for a better spirit, rather than that we shall write a new name on our banner in deference to wicked prejudice or wilful ignorance. Under our church name as it stands, the most signal manifestations of the Divine favor have been accorded to us. In every step we have been guided and supported by the hand of God. The name we have borne during the vicissitudes, trials and sorrows of the last thirty-four years, has not repelled the Almighty and ever gracious Head of the church. The name we have borne under fiery baptisms of suffering has been consecrated by continual baptisms of the Holy Ghost. In no spirit of boasting, but with devout and fervent gratitude, we make the challenge. If God be with us who can be against us? Under our church name as it stands, we present to the world a Christian communion remarkable for its agreement in doctrine, the homogeneousness of its constituent elements and the unity of its purposes and plans. Examples are not wanting in which the substance of essential unity has been sacrificed for the shadow of external conformity. A new departure in church nomenclature on our part might lead to that which would furnish another warning to such as are tempted to substitute a doubtful expediency for unchangeable principles. Under our church name as it stands, all the titles to our church property, involving many millions of dollars, are secured and settled. Those titles should not be disturbed by anything short of undoubted and urgent necessity. It has already been shown that no such necessity exists. The question has already been submitted to, and acted on by the church. The General Conference in 1866 submitted the matter to the Annual Conferences. The proposition to change the name of the church was then rejected. In the light of subsequent events, it now seems to us that this action ought to be, and will be final. Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the following resolution;

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Conference the question of the change of name was finally settled by the action of the Annual Conferences in the years 1866 and 1867, and we recommend that there be no further agitation of this matter."

This report, so far as we know, is as applicable to the situation now as it was four years ago, and perhaps, in some respects more so, as sectional feelings and prejudice have considerably abated, and the two sections, North and South, have grown more tolerant of each other's presence and work. Those who favor the removal of "South" from the name of our church are entitled to a hearing, and, if the reasons are sufficient, their request should be granted. But, so far, no new light has come to us since the adoption of the above report by the General Conference at Atlanta. The present name is geographical in its origin, but, so far from having any political significance, it was, in fact, a protest against ecclesiastical meddling in political matters. Taken in connection with its origin and the subsequent history, the word "South" stands for a non-political church. It also stands for a polity somewhat different from that of the Methodist Episcopal Church in regard to the episcopacy and the powers of the General Conference. The occasion of the division disclosed this divergence in church polity, and our suffix stands for that. Beyond these points, it may be, also, that it stands for a type of Methodism racy of the soil in which it has had its chief development, and that it is peculiarly adapted to the Southern people.

It is true that the name, South, was taken in connection with the plan of separation which restricted the operations of both branches by a geographical line. But the fact that this line seems now, by common consent, to be ignored does not necessarily make the name objectionable. Churches with geographical names are among the most expansive. The Church of England, the Greek Church, the Armenian, the Moravian, for example. The name South was in accord with the plan of separation by the provisions of which one part became the Methodist Episcopal Church of the North, and the other of the South. It never did stand for slavery, pro or anti, and it never did mean anything sectional in a political sense. Our presence in the West, on the Pacific coast, and in other places outside of the former slave States, was demanded by Southern people who had settled in those regions, and, to some extent, by Northern people who were sick and tired of political preaching. To them the Church, South, was dear, because the very name meant a non-political church, and a church that preached the gospel, and nothing else. Those fields were entered by us because the Church, South, was wanted there.

How the case is now we do not know so well, but we suspect that those whom our church is likely to reach find no objection in our name, and that, with the most of them, it is entirely acceptable. We do not wish to proselyte the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and those who are offended by the word South would not probably come to us if it were stricken out. It would then be necessary to explain and vindicate our origin, history and existence, and would be more difficult than ever to satisfy the gainsayers.

Embalmed in the name South are history and principles dear to our people; principles especially that are vital to the purity of the church, and that, so far from being surrendered, must be defended and asserted always. Our testimony as a church is connected with this name, and to change it would have the appearance of betraying a most important trust. To change the name would induce confusion and embarrassment in our church titles, and in the imprint of our standard literature, and it would unsettle the minds of our people.

The losses to our membership in the South would probably far exceed any gains that might accrue elsewhere. Then, another name must be sought. "Methodist Episcopal Church in America" would do very well, but it would unhinge things, and be quite as offensive as any other.

While time makes our present name more and more valuable to us as a symbol of principles, we have hope that the regions beyond will come at length to understand it aright, and that it will be a name of acceptance and strength throughout the world. As the question presents itself to us, we can not afford to drop "South," or to substitute for it something else. It would be a serious menace to our very existence as a church, and in any case it would weaken us by creating far more disaffection than it could possibly conciliate.

Coming Out from Among Them.

It was from among idolaters probably, but also from among unbelievers. The Corinthians were to be separate. They could not mingle with heathen in their idolatrous worship, nor in their lustful and intemperate pleasures. In religion, in morals, in many social customs, the primitive Christians were distinct from the people about them.

There has always been contention concerning the point at which the line should be drawn. The difficulty has grown out of the worldly spirit in the church, however, and not out of any real obscurity in the principles of Christianity. Separation is as imperative now as it was in the time of the apostles. Sin is quite as flagrant in these days, and the vices of society are much of the same character. The two companies are as wide apart as light and darkness, and they must ever be.

The temptation to pass over into the domain of the world is strong. Its methods of business are apparently lucrative, there is gain in its gambling, and speculation, and fraudulent expedients. Its social customs and fashionable life are full of fascination, and are well calculated to allure those especially who have grown rich and prosperous. The world's pleasures are attractive. In them the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life have unrestrained course. How to "come out from among them," it would not be hard to determine if the eye were single, and the heart intent only on the glory of God. The love of Christ, if in full possession of the soul, will always reach a swift decision. If people in heart come out from the world, the practical details are easily mastered. We insist that the Scriptural injunction is still in force, and that there is abundant occasion for its application. The idolatry of wealth and fashion and pleasure is not now connected with the religious rites of heathen superstition and worship, but there is the same excess of riot, intemperance, lasciviousness and wastefulness of money. And there is also the same enmity to God, and the same extravagance in the service of the god of this world.

Instead of coming out from the world, many professed Christians plunge into it with avidity, and at length become swallowed up in its exciting and dissipating pursuits. Certainly a mere outward union with the visible church does not constitute Christian separateness. There must be something more than this to identify us with the kingdom of God, and to dissolve our connection with the unclean. To profess to be saints, and yet to live as sinners, is not an uncommon thing. There is no renunciation of the world, in fact, and the espousal of the cause of Christ is only in form. This coming out from the unbelievers is a decided movement, a signal divergence from the course which absorbs the thought, time and activities of the devotees of style and pleasure.

To live in the world, and yet to be separate from it, is the demonstration of every godly life. In it, and yet not of it, is the character to be realized. And this character is a not unusual product of grace. It is the living part of the church of Christ, always and everywhere. Whether amid the surroundings of paganism or in the heart of our modern society, there is this unmistakable sign of the elect of God. Not to come out from the world, and not to be separate, is to be reprobate, and to be condemned with the world. And the case is all the more perilous when this thorough and intense worldliness is connected with a dead and formal profession of religion.

It is sad to see souls blinded by the god of this world, led away from the fountain of living waters, and seeking to drink from the broken cisterns of earth, and becoming infatuated with the follies of a society from which God has been banished. For their own sakes, it behooves those who pretend to be the friends of Christ to come out from all associations that compromise their faith, and that soil and enfeeble the conscience. This Scripture has its use for the church of our day: "Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God."

The worldly Christian sacrifices the pleasures and comforts of religion, and endangers the final salvation of the soul. God can not dwell in a heart preoccupied with the love of the world. The love of the Father is not in those who are absorbed in the whirl of dissipating amusements.

The influence of the worldly Christian is lost upon the world. To be the light of the world the Christian must be separate. When he becomes identified with it his light goes out, and his very profession is brought into contempt. This plea that we must mingle with the world in its dancing, theater-going, wine-bibbing and gaming, and extravagant society entertainments in order to do it good, is a delusion of the devil. It is to countenance sin, and to partake of it in order to cure it. The world is made worse by it, while the Christian is lost.

Consider the perversion of money. If it is the Lord's money, no one, however rich, can spend it to gratify the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, without incurring guilt. It is wasting the Lord's goods. While material and spiritual destitution is crying for relief from every quarter, and the work of Christ is languishing, people claiming the Christian name are squandering thousands and millions on their pleasures and social gratifications.

What the Scriptures call the world is the dreadful vortex into which souls are drawn, and where fatal shipwreck overtakes them.

A Scriptural Self-Examination.

"Have faith in God." But I have doubts. What is it you doubt? God's power, goodness, truthfulness? No, I don't doubt anything in relation to God. What, then? I doubt myself. Do you doubt your sincere desire to love and serve God? No; but I doubt my own goodness, my own worthiness. Whose goodness and worthiness is it that you are called to believe in, your own or Christ's? In Christ's, surely. Then why trouble yourself, or be troubled because you can not believe in your own worthiness? Suppose you could believe in your own goodness and worthiness, would it be obeying God? would it bring you any real help? Is there more than one name given under heaven whereby we must be saved? No. Then why be trying to believe in any other, yourself, for example? Perhaps we feel we can not believe in our own meritoriousness, and, if we could, it would be a poor and fruitless business. Let us remember it is God we are to believe in—to believe Christ came to save sinners, even the chief of sinners, the most unworthy. That it is the weary and heavy laden, the poor in spirit, he invites and blesses. So that your felt insufficiency and need of him is your real fitness to claiming in Christ's name all God has promised through him.

Let us test ourselves by another text: "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." I must not be all to myself. My being and circumstances must not be the limit of my view. I am not alone in this world; there are others, and these have needs and claims much like mine, and quite as just and sacred. "I have feelings, and I wish them respected by my fellowmen in their intercourse with me, and in their treatment of me." So others have feelings too. Am I as considerate of them as I would have them of me in what I say, in what I do, and in what I think in relation to them? or do I think and care only for my own feelings, and forget or ignore their feelings? Again, I have opinions; opinions, the result of thoughtful examination and honest conviction. I do not like to have these opinions treated with contempt, or laughed at as shallow and absurd. But others have opinions, too, as honestly, perhaps quite as intelligently, entertained as mine. Do I recognize this when stating mine, or speaking of another's? Do I give him as much credit for honesty and intelligence as I claim for myself? And while I insist that another is fallible, do I admit I am not infallible? Further, another has a name, and a character. So have I, and they are very dear to me. No possessions do I cherish more sacredly or esteem more highly. Then let me remember that this is the way my neighbor regards his name and character. I would have others to be careful of my good name, and by no word, look or gesture throw the shadow of a doubt upon my character; just so considerately and charitably others would have me treat them. Do I in these regards so look on the things of others as well as on my own? Lastly, I have material interest and necessities. I wish others to recognize these facts in their business relations with me, to do by me as I would have them do by me, in matters of buying and selling, in hire and wages, then I have but to turn this round to see that my neighbor is conditioned as I am, and asks, and justly, the same consideration and fair dealing that I ask. Do I square my business by this golden rule?

Let us consider and examine ourselves in relation to another rule of life, found in another text. We know the text rises above the natural, and necessitates for its obedience the gracious, the supernatural help of the Spirit of all grace. It reads: "In honor preferring one another." The parallel passage in St. Peter is: "Be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility." Indeed, we need to be and must be, or we will never "in honor prefer another." To see another reap the honor of something that I originated, and to prefer that he should do so, and so prefer as not to murmur in word or thought, but sincerely say Amen. To let another be chosen before you to discharge some honorable trust which your consciousness of power assures you you could discharge as well or better, and yet prefer it should be so. To see another, perhaps in more ways than one less deserving than yourself, supercede you, and you thrown in shadow, and put out of view. It is a high degree of grace that enables us to do this. One told that "meekest" of men—"Eldad and Medad do prophecy in the camp—my Lord, Moses forbid them." "And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them." Hard it is to say: "Let all win honor, win more than me." W.

Letter from China.

MR. EDITOR: You have already heard of the educational movement which our mission is now beginning in Shanghai. One of the schools, numbering two hundred pupils, will be opened on the ninth of March, and the other one will be opened about the middle of April, with the same number of pupils. From the time the announcement was made in the leading Chinese daily paper, published in Shanghai, a great and a growing interest in it has been manifested by many of the leading Chinese, not only in Shanghai, but in other provinces. Many of them have visited Dr. Allen, have found out what he proposes to do, and they not only send their children, but assist by subscribing a few dollars, and exerting their influence in favor of the school.

They are loud in their praises, and the readiness, and even eagerness, with which they enrolled their children's names upon the matriculation book, are evidences of their appreciation of what is being done in their behalf. Nothing which has been done before in the way of missionary enterprise has created so much interest or attracted so much attention.

These schools and the college, which we hope to have in a few years, promises to meet a long-felt want, and we believe that they will be the key to unlock many doors which have heretofore been barred against missionaries. The plans have been carefully and prayerfully worked out. From the very beginning it seems that the hand of Providence has been leading, guiding, directing and opening the way. Every one has been surprised to see the developments which have been made, and we, who have had to do with it more directly, and whom it most concerns, thank God and take courage. There is a great and a growing demand for such an educational movement as Dr. Allen has inaugurated, and if the Christian Church does not take it in hand the world will, and then what evil results may follow. The opportunity is a great, grand and glorious one, and we appeal to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to assist in carrying on this great work.

Dr. Allen will place his plans for the proposed college in the hands of the proper persons at home, and we believe that they will endorse them, and give the necessary aid. We not only want money, but we want men, men strong, bold and determined, men who have faith in God, and who are willing to make any sacrifice which may be necessary for carrying on this noble work. Will the Southern Methodist Church let this great opportunity pass by? or will they furnish the men and the means for carrying out the proposed scheme? Let every Christian, every one who loves Christ and the souls for whom he died, assist in this matter.

Dr. Allen's long and faithful service for the Chinese government, the books he has translated for the government, and his own books, which he has written in Chinese, have been very highly approved by the government, and he being so well known in China, through his books and periodicals, is eminently fitted and qualified for this work. He has the respect, the esteem and the admiration of the Chinese wherever his books have been read, and no foreigner in China could succeed in a movement of this kind as well as he, because they are not so well known.

Hitherto missionary effort has been confined almost entirely to the lower classes, and the higher and influential classes have stood aloof, and have not deigned to show or feel any interest in what has been done or is now doing for their salvation.

A most encouraging feature of the schools is the class of pupils who attend, and the class of people whom we hope to have access to through them. Some of the pupils are the sons and nephews of mandarins and other officials, quite a number of them are the sons of literary men, and many of them are the sons of the wealthier mercantile class. Not one dozen out of the four hundred now enrolled are of the class who have been attending mission schools. Those who do come are able to attend school longer, and to receive an education before they are taken from school and forced to learn some trade in order that they may assist their parents in obtaining a livelihood. We do not propose to discard the poorer classes at all, but to keep up schools for them, and in this way we hope to have access to the high and the low, the rich and the poor. Only first-class teachers will be employed, and the teaching is to be thorough, both in English and Chinese.

The religious exercises of the schools will be the same as they are in the schools in America, reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer, morning and evening. We are not so sanguine as to hope that every pupil who enters the schools, or even takes the college course, will become a Christian. Many attend our Christian colleges at home and do not embrace Christianity. We hope to so instruct them, and so impress upon their minds and hearts the superiority of Christianity over their idolatrous rites and customs, that they will see the utter folly of idolatry, and no more bow down to lifeless objects of wood and stone.

Not long since Dr. Allen received a letter from a mandarin in a distant province expressing his appreciation of the school, and asked that two of his nephews be admitted, saying: "Teach them the Bible, take them to Sunday-school and preaching, and if they wish to embrace Christianity and unite with the church I shall not interfere." These pupils will tell at home what they have heard and learned, their parents and friends will become interested and visit the schools, and we also hope that they will attend preaching. Thus the influence will extend from one to another, and many a conservative Chinaman will throw away his prejudice, overcome his opposition, and learn that the missionary intends to do him good.

The interest in the whole movement grows day by day, and it has assumed proportions far beyond our expectations. At first it was feared that the number would be small, but now we are crowded, and there are at least one hundred who have been refused admission, because we can not provide for them. Whatever is going to be done must be done soon. Shanghai is the place for the college. No better could be found in China. The price of land is rising at a fearful rate, and the sooner a piece of land can be purchased the better.

We need another school similar to the two we have already, which ought to be provided for at once. Will the church assist in this work? We believe she will. We have faith in God and confidence in man. We believe that the unnumbered prayers which have been sent to heaven will be answered, and that we are not doomed to disappointment. We have prayed for an open door, and for access to the people; let us, as a church, enter this door, and do earnest effectual Christian work. Barriers are being removed; prejudices are giving way. The work moves on tardily, it may be, but surely. Many silent influences are at work, and the gospel of light and love will take hold of the hearts and minds of China's millions.

Let us project a work that will have an influence on the people, no longer be confined to narrow views and narrow limits, not aim at the conversion of this or that individual, but at the conversion of China. The opportunity is offered to us; we can embrace it, and we ought to do it. May God open the hearts and minds of the people to see the importance of this great work; then their purse-strings will be unloosed, their own hearts will be blessed, and untold benefits will be conferred on this people.

Living Without Labor.

In all communities, especially in large cities, there are men with brains and muscles sufficient to make them valuable contributors to the general good, and yet they stand idle from sheer laziness. If they work at all, it is to find out how they can best reap the profits without taking part in the pains of labor. They are men who live, as they say, by their wits; men who would speculate in the necessaries of life, while their neighbors are suffering for want of them. In no sense are they producers, but they are ravenous consumers. They stand at the point where produce and consumption meet, eager only to lay hold upon the profits of trade.

Such persons are generally liberal patrons of lottery schemes. If they have failed in other enterprises, and gotten very low down in funds, they still manage to get hold of money enough to "take chances" in the lottery. Here they hope to receive values without paying the legitimate price, which is labor.

In what do the men who get up and patronize such schemes differ from professional gamblers? Both classes are men who, in this respect, produce nothing. They both play in a game of hazard for money. The winnings of both are without labor, and every dollar won is a dollar taken, without compensation, from the pocket of somebody else.

There are people in this city—the writer has met and expostulated with some of them—who, too proud or too indolent to work, often receive money from churches and other benevolent institutions, and yet buy a lottery ticket every week. In some cases church members, whose moral education in this respect, at least, is woefully defective, are not only patrons, but outspoken advocates of lotteries. It need not be stated that these people are of as little use to the church as they are to the world and society at large; they stand as trees without fruit and cumberers of the ground. Their aversion to work has not only placed them out of sympathy with the busy world around them, but has made them drones and stumbling blocks in the church.

This is, indeed, a crying evil, that so many people are living without labor. A great reformation is needed here. But little can be accomplished with those who have grown gray in idleness, yet with the rising generation a new order of things may be effected. Let public teachers and parents impress upon the young the nobleness and dignity of labor. Let it be proclaimed, in public and private, that he who will not work is recreant to his highest obligations both to God and man. Let our young people learn that true independence, self-respect and manliness of character can never be attained to without labor, that they can never win real success in life until by patient, faithful work they earn every dollar that they receive. Above all, let them learn that the processes of labor here are essential elements of the soul's education for a glorious immortality.

"He who bravely works on earth
Exercises his soul's immortal worth,
While they who here but little do
Are both to God and man untrue."

Among the Editors.

Christian Index.

Now, how does it happen that persons from a higher latitude who spend a few days, weeks, or months, or even years at the South, should know more about it than this editor, or than any of his relatives or friends? For be it known, that he has made diligent inquiry among his friends and neighbors, about these startling discoveries, and has never found one who was not, like himself, wholly unaware of the existence of any such thing.

As already said, we do not question the good intentions of the letter-writers, and we presume, of course, that they will be polite and kind enough not to question ours. We only ask, how is it, that strangers discover facts about the manners, habits, and customs of a people, concerning which those people themselves are entirely ignorant?

We offera solution which, of course, we do not ask any one to accept, for we can not be sure that it is right. It takes facts a long time to overcome theories. A man's mind may be filled with erroneous conceptions concerning things of which he has heard, conceptions which he is unwilling for religious or political or other reasons, to give up, and to which he, and all his friends have been committed for a lifetime, and which enlist his feelings, and arouse his enthusiasm. He visits the scenes of these things, and everything that he sees takes the hue, and the shape, which his preconceived opinions had given them, and which it is necessary for them to have, in order to sustain his theory, the theory being accepted, of course, as eternal truth. Subjectively, as to himself all his preconceptions take the form of realities. He deserlbes them with truthful intentions; yet unconsciously to himself, he draws largely on his imagination for his facts. It is something like Plato's theory of the beautiful, elegantly reproduced in modern times by the French philosopher Cousin, which teaches that beauty is less an objective fact than a subjective state; or in language less dignified but more easily understood, "It's all in your eye."

But it is one thing to proclaim, and another to act the truth. It is one thing to say, and quite another to do. It is one thing to give, another to take our own advice. The rough and senseless way some parents have of dealing with their children, will not be tolerated in grown people. You may say to your son, "do as I say, not as you see me do." He would resent if he dared. Grown people and children too, will resent such inconsistency in preachers. The Apostles said, follow us as we follow Christ. Paul boasted that he had taught his flock from house to house, and that he had not shunned to declare unto them the whole counsel of God. But turn to another part of his experience and read: "We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man." To the Thessalonians he said: "Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblamably we behaved ourselves among you that believe." They set their converts a good example. Members in that day found their pastors right livers, as well as good preachers. A sensible question is found in the letter to the Romans. Let preachers apply it. "Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest not thou thyself?" We not only want to feel in the delivery of the sermon that a redeemed man is behind it, but that we have a redeemed and sanctified man among us during the week.

"What shall we do with our boys?" is a question pregnant with many hopes and fears, very difficult of solution, and requiring great patience, prayer and thoughtfulness. If the question be changed a little in form, and put somewhat after this order, "What shall we do for the future of our boys and girls?" or, "for the future boys and girls?" we would answer with the sentiment, if not in the language, of the celebrated daughter of Neeker, in response to Napoleon, and say, "Educate the daughters of the State." We mean, in the best and strongest sense, educate—that is, not having a fashionable training and nothing more. A woman thus educated, not only in mind, but in heart, becoming a mother, will mold the mind of her child to high and holy thoughts and purposes. The marvel is that we have as many good and useful men and women as we have. The higher education of women, true, sensible, practical education, recognizes the fact that they are in a world of effort and progress, that they are a part of it, and upon them rest grave responsibilities. Such an education will banish the notion that women are the "dolls and butterflies" of society, only to be dressed and paraded, to be looked at and admired. Such mothers, sisters, and daughters, as indicated, will do more to solve the problem of "What shall we do with and for our children?" than all the reformatories in creation's wide domain. The best school of morals in this world is a Christian home with an educated Christian mother as the president.

Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.

And what unconscionable vanity it is in any minister of Christ to regard it as a lowering of the dignity of his office to come down from the pulpit to the homes and daily walks of men? How can "the tone of his piety" suffer by bearing the consolations of the gospel to the sick, and sorrowing, and needy, or its admonitions and instructions to men amid the buffettings and temptations of the world? The fact is his piety will suffer if he does not perform this important and imperative part of his appropriate work. And can we not safely add, that he will be shorn of much of his power in the pulpit by such neglect? From his interviews with his people he can derive suggestive themes for his most effective public addresses. How his "intellectual enjoyment" can be abridged by pulling himself into sympathy with men, and being thus better prepared to bring the truth home to their consciences and hearts, it were difficult to explain.

The minister who confines himself to his study, and ignores pastoral visitation, may be able to furnish his people with an intellectual repast from Sabbath to Sabbath, but he can not feed them with "food convenient"—suited to the cravings of their spiritual being, and the exigencies of their daily experience.

The Standard.

The inter-relation and mutual helpfulness of home and foreign missions may be learned from these two facts, brought out in our hearing by one of our missionary brethren not very long ago. (1) There are six thousand Swedish Baptists in this country who were converted abroad, under the labors of our foreign missionaries. Thus do foreign missions assist in the home mission work. (2) There are a great many colored people being educated in the freedmen's schools of the South who will go abroad to labor. Thus do domestic missions return the favor, and in their way contribute to the service in foreign lands. The work is all one. When we take part in home mission efforts we are aiding indirectly the enterprise on other shores, and vice versa. The spirit also is one. The church which takes a great interest in foreign missions has generally its circle of domestic mission helpers. No Christian who fails to give to both causes his deliberation and prayer has realized either the dignity of his calling or the magnitude of the service to which he is committed.

EXPENSES OF DELEGATES.—For expenses of delegates to the General Conference, I acknowledge the receipt of the following: From Rev. I. L. Peebles, Lake circuit, $5; from Rev. M. C. Calloway, Spring Ridge, $4. CHAS. B. GALLOWAY.,

Jackson Miss., April 8, 1882.

Rev. R. C. Calhoun, in charge of Autaugaville circuit, Alabama Conference, writing April 4, says:

MR. EDITOR: The people generally speaking, think we have pretty hard times in this country, and it is a fact that nearly all are buying corn now in consequence of the very short crops last year, but, really, we have much to thank a kind heavenly Father for. It is thought that vegetation is at least a month in advance of last year. The oat crop at present is exceedingly fine. The health of the country, we suppose, was never better. The sentiment on the temperance question is uncommonly healthy. There is no whisky sold in the charge, and we do not wish any to be. We need a revival of religion and we hope to have it. The people received their preacher kindly and continue to treat him well.

Rev. J. A. Parker, writing from Claiborne parish, La., April 4, says: "While at present, the pressure upon the purses and patience of the people is almost beyond endurance, the prospect was never better, for crops of all sorts—fruit, oats and corn in particular. The outlook is as full of cheer as can be. The weather is unusually fine. Planters are well up with their farm work, though the acreage is, in some instances, two, or even four times as much as last year. The preachers have to live very closely, as their receipts are unusually meagre. Many planters are buying corn on time at $2 per bushel—meal at $9 per barrel, and bacon at twenty-cents per pound.

Our new presiding elder is starting out finely. Under the long rest, this writers health is improving."

Very deeply do we regret the death, in this city recently, of our old friend William Allen Bartlett. An active and exemplary Christian, he went about doing good. His fellowship with Christ's followers was not limited by sectarian bounds. He loved all good people, and was esteemed and loved by them. Our associations with him for many years were always cordial and pleasant, and we have often taken sweet counsel together in regard to the things of God. He was at the time of his death the senior ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, having discharged the duties of that office for more than thirty-two years. From the minute adopted by the session of his church we make the following extract:

He died after a lingering illness which was marked by much suffering and, in the intermissions of pain, by a degree of lethargy which disabled him largely from intercourse with others. He was not permitted, however, to depart without a full and articulate expression of trust in that Redeemer whom he had so long served, and of his readiness to go to be with him in his glory. During that precious season of unclouded consciousness he sent messages of love to his kindred and friends, and an affectionate farewell to the members of the church in which he had so long been a ruler. The suffusion of many eyes when this message was delivered at his funeral, and the large attendance upon that solemn service, testified to the reciprocal esteem and love in which he himself was held.

—The President has vetoed the Chinese immigration bill. In its present shape it can not be passed over the veto. Possibly a new bill may be passed—one that will receive the President's approval. It is probable however, that the subject has been disposed of for the present session. The Democrats have made their record on it, and the Republicans can hardly improve theirs by anything that would be acceptable to the President and the East.

—Rev. J. M. Beard, pastor, closed a protracted meeting at Moreau Street, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of this city on Friday last. The services were well attended, and there were several conversions. Thirteen persons united with the church during the progress of the meeting.

—We are indebted to Dr. Joseph Jones, president of the Board of Health of the State of Louisiana, for a copy of the Annual Report of the Board to the General Assembly of Louisiana. It is a voluminous work of 427 pages, octavo, and contains a vast amount of valuable information.

—The floods are generally declining throughout the Mississippi valley. The only exception is southern Louisiana. There the destruction is very great, but at last accounts the water was stationary, and it will probably soon begin to fall.

—A superb sciopticon entertainment is to be given at the Upper Bethel in this city, on the evenings of April 14-15, by Mr. J. L. Harris, assisted by Mr. R. A. Angell.

—Rev. P. J. Eckles, a supernumerary member of the North Mississippi Conference, died, at his residence in Byhalia, Miss., March 27.

—The New Orleans District Conference meets to-day, Thursday, April 13, at Baton Rouge. Bishop Keener will preside.

—Rev. J. J. Brooks, of the White River Conference, and stationed at Forrest city, Ark., died April 1.

Revival news, says the Western Methodist, March 30, comes from Columbus, Miss. With the pastor, Rev. S. A. Steel, and his whole charge, we rejoice. The Dispatch, March 25, says: "The religious services at the Methodist church grow in interest daily. There have been ten professions, and the meeting has hardly begun. It is general and entirely Catholic in character. Rev. Mr. Ramsey, of Starkville, is assisting, but members of the church, many others than Methodists, are earnestly at work."

A brief note from Rev. J. A. Bowen, the zealous pastor of our church at Corinth, Miss., tells of glorious success in his charge. He writes March 27: "To-day we closed a two weeks' meeting in our church—forty conversions to date—many added to the church, which is wonderfully built up. May the good work extend and continue.

We last week, says the New York Methodist, closed our counting of the result of the year's revivals in Methodist churches. We expect still to have reports from many churches; but it has become difficult to separate the new from the former accounts. We have taken much pains to make our returns accurate so far as they have gone. The total figures show in 1,700 churches more than fifty thousand conversions, about five-sixths of which are in the Methodist Episcopal Churches of the land. We have no reason to suppose that we have collected from more than one-third of the revivals in American Methodism this year; and 150,000 conversions is propably a moderate estimate for the year. The attempt to keep tally has impressed us with the value of such statistics; and we hope some better method of collecting those precious facts may be hereafter devised. Two large inferences are fairly drawn from this great work; 1. That an organized evangelistic force like our ministry is better than any other; 2. That faith is still alive in the land.

Personal and Other.

—The New York Evening Post in an editorial on "Longfellow as a Professor," says, "His relations with his pupils were never warmly or cordially personal; he rarely invited them to his house or cultivated their acquaintance. That sort of intercourse was rare in his time, and it is exceptional even to-day. But in respect of courtesy, his manners quite anticipated the present time, and were a marked advance upon the merely pedagogical relation which then prevailed. He was one of the few professors who then addressed their pupils as "Mr;" his tone to them, though not paternal or brotherly was always gentlemanly. As an instructor he was clear, suggestive, and encouraging; his lectures on the great French writers were admirable, and his facility in equivalent phrases was of great use to his pupils and elevated their standard of translation. He was scrupulously faithful to his duties, and even went through the exhaustive process of marking French exercises with exemplary patience."

—Although the Rev. Joseph Cook is traveling mainly for the purpose of rest and the acquisition of new information, he does not abstain altogether from lecturing. In Bombay last month, he delivered a course of lectures, under the auspices of the Christian laymen of the city, in defense of Christianity against the current objections which are urged against it by educated Hindus. The lectures were said to be very successful.—S. S. Times.

An agent for the sale of some household article attempted to mount the steps of a house recently, but a dog came around the corner and took half a yard of cloth from the back of his coat. The man was sliding out when the owner of the house came and asked: "Did dere dog bite you?" "He didn't bite me, but he rutted my coat," was the reply. "My good friend, excuse dog if he didn't hide you. He ish a young dog now, but by and by he shall take hold of some agents and eat der bones right out of them. He hides a coat now, but he shall soon do better."

Perhaps President Arthur may be in a mood to appreciate a story that is told of President Lincoln. An old friend expressed regret to see him look so worn and anxious, and hate him have courage and he would yet conquer the Rebellion. Sadly and with a sigh the President answered: "It is not the Rebellion, but it's the post-office at Pipestown that's troubling me."

The eminent counsel had been speaking four hours in a complicated appeal case concerning a boundary wall, when, gazing at the bench, he found that all the judges were asleep. "Mamma, they say that Mayor H. is broken-hearted because his daughter has eloped. What is 'elope' Mamma?" "Elope" means to run away. Lillie H. has eloped with her Papa's coachman and that was naughty, wasn't it?" "Yes, Mamma, very naughty, but can't Lillie's Papa get another coachman?"

JERSEY CATTLE.—In beauty of form and color, in gentleness of disposition and in length of life, says a writer, these cattle have no superiors. In amount of butter produced in a year they have no equals, and in color, flavor and texture the butter of this breed is now accepted in all markets as the standard of excellence. The cows of this breed weigh about eight hundred pounds. Their eyes are large and mild, the head small and lean, the face dished, the horns small, incurved and yellow, the ear small, thin and yellow inside, neck and throat straight, thin and clean, back level and broad at loins, barrel well ribbed and deep at flanks, legs short and small, tail fine and long, hide thin and mellow and yellow, hair soft, udder very full forward and behind and free from hair, teats squarely placed, milk veins large and long, escutcheons large and full on thighs, disposition kind and quiet. The appearance of the Jersey, as compared with other breeds, is not only small but thin. The colors include all shades of fawn, drab, brown and gray, either in one uniform color or varying in shade with different parts of the body or broken in patches of white. Unfortunately there was for a time a "fashion" in colors in England and this country, and breeding with reference to a particular, or for a uniform color, undoubtedly interfered with the more important occupation of breeding for butter. Happily this vagary has almost passed away. The color of the hair of a Jersey has no connection whatever with the butter yield as to quality or quantity, nor is it any indication of the vigor or of the disposition of the animal. The Jersey is a good eater and a good "digester," but when compared with what she produces she does not eat more than the cows of other breeds. The rations most favorable in this country for the health of the cow, the development of the calf in the womb, and the production of the largest amount of the best quality of butter, are about twenty pounds of hay, four to six quarts of a mixture of equal weights of cob corn meal and wheat bran, and half a peck of carrots and beats chopped up and mixed with the grain. This for a winter ration. In the summer it is well to supplement the pasture with a grain fodder of oats and peas, millet, sweet corn stalks or barley, according to the season, and to this a couple of quarts of corn and wheat meal may be added. A larger grain ration than the cow can at once direct toward the warmth of the body and the supply of fat in the udder will occasion a tendency to put fat on the carcass, and this tendency encouraged will be fatal to the greatest butter yield. From the start care must be taken to give the Jersey enough food to keep it warm and keep it growing if young, and keep it steadily developing the foetus and manufacturing butter if mature, but all food beyond that required for these purposes will be worse than wasted, for it will divert the Jersey from the butter producer, in which character she is a success, to the beef producer, in which role she always must be and always will be a failure. Great care should be exercised with regard to high feeding before the cow calves; with cows of this breed it is well to withdraw all grain for at least six weeks before the calf is born. While it is important to give the cow food sufficient to supply all of her needs and those of the almost fully developed foetus, yet it should be remembered that at this time the cow is taking comparatively little exercise, she is giving little or comparatively little milk or butter, and the foetus, until it comes into the world, requires less than one ounce of nourishment a day; all of these needs, good hay and perhaps a few roots will supply; grain will unduly rouse the system. Our object should be to prepare the cow as far as possible for the great change which her system will undergo when all the energies of her organism are turned suddenly from the nourishment of the foetus in the womb to the nourishment of the calf from the udder, and this strain, great in all cases, is vastly increased, it should be remembered, in the case of artificially high bred cows, who pour into the bag enough milk to supply half a dozen calves instead of the one which nature has made them to bring forth. It can not be too strongly urged that in order to avoid the too frequent cases of death or injury, from milk fever and garget all grain should be removed for a month at least before the period of parturition, and given sparingly for a least a week thereafter. It seems to be better for the dam and no worse for the calf if the latter is removed at the end of forty-eight hours. For the first two or three weeks let whole warm milk be given; at the end of this period skim milk warmed may be substituted. This may be given up to six or eight quarts a day until the calf is well established in the habit of eating grass or whole oats and hay.—New York Herald.

FEEDING CORN-STALKS.—A farmer, writing to the American Agriculturist, says: "I have never until now been able to account for the different values various practical people put upon corn-stalks. True, there is a great difference in different kinds of corn, in the way it is fed, &c., but after all the great variation in value is caused by its dryness. That which is cured somewhat moist, even if more or less moldy, is greatly preferred by the cattle to hard, dry, brittle stuff, which has lost almost all its flavor and doubtless a good deal of its nutritive qualities. Simply sprinkling the portions of stalk to be fed next, so that they will have a few hours to absorb the water, helps a great deal, but still it is not at all like having naturally moist fodder. If the water used to soften the stalks is salted and flavored with a few handfuls of bran this makes a great difference. No doubt the best plan to feed corn fodder is to cut and steam it; with such additions of roots, bran, &c., as are desirable. Few can do this; many, however, follow what is the next best plan—to cut the corn fodder and mix it with bran, then to pour scalding water in abundance over the mass and cover it up with rubber sheets, rubber army blankets, or place it in a box with a close lid, so that it will have a good soaking and "sweating." In whatever way it is fed it should be cut—the finer the better; but even if it be cut in foot lengths, every farmer will find his account for it. Part of dry-fed stalks is rejected and gets into the manure, where it is a great nuisance, first in getting it out and then in clean culture. Those of us who can not afford to cut our corn fodder fine—to have it "chaffed," as the English say—can at least be tidy enough to have it cut in six inch lengths with a broad axe or hatchet."

THE STRAWBERRY BED.—There is just one time to make a strawberry bed, and that time is now! Under any circumstances a strawberry plant must grow a season before it will give a crop; there is no way in which plants may be set this spring and give fruit the same season. If any "nursery agent" offers such—don't buy them. Much that has been said about strawberry culture has conveyed the impression that it is a great deal of trouble; that runners have to be cut off and much care given otherwise, while in fact it is no more trouble to raise strawberries, than it is to grow carrots. But the cost? Is very little—nothing compared with the result in fruit. One can begin as small as he pleases; if he can not afford the outlay for a large bed, let him buy enough for a start and raise his own plants.

An ordinary family should have at least two hundred plants, and generally four hundred will not be found too many if the fruit is used freely. It is better to provide for an abundance. If restricted to one kind, we have no hesitation in saying, Charles Downing. If there are successful strawberry growers in the vicinity, find what does best for them and plant the same kind. If four hundred plants are set, there may be safely four kinds.

How to Plant.—Select a good bit of soil, all the better if it was in potatoes last year, and if practicable within sight of the house, and prepare it just as you would for a good crop of cabbages; this means an abundance of the best manure well worked in. Mark out the rows two feet apart, three if a cultivator is to be used, and set the plants one foot apart in the row, using a trowel to open the ground, and when the plant is put in, crowd the soil down firmly over the roots with both hands. Thereafter run the cultivator, hoe, or rake, often enough to make the soil mellow and keep down the weeds.—American Agriculturist.

SEED CORN.—Look to the seed corn, this year especially. It is better to pay any price for sure seed than to use suspected corn for nothing. Recollect that it takes but six quarts of seed per acre, so the actual cost between poor and good seed is not to be entertained for a moment, especially when we consider the loss from a bad stand, or no stand at all, and the misery of cultivating corn, little and big, in the same hill. The seed will be plump, bright and without any wasted appearance in the "skin" where the grains come together. If the grain is cut across or if carefully peeled down the "chit" (germ) will show the same bright, fresh appearance. Such seed placed between folds of moist cloth or pressed into soil in a flower pot, covered with two inches of earth and kept moist and at a temperature of seventy-five to eighty degrees, should germinate in three days. There is one point, however, always to be remembered in the germination of seed—that is, the older the seed the slower it germinates, and also, as a rule, the less it will develop as a plant; yet the seed bearing qualities do not thereby seem to be injured. On the contrary, very often the seed yield of a plant is diminished by a too luxuriant growth and from a well known law. In selecting seed from ordinary open cribs, avoid them unless they are water tight, and never select from broad cribs. When the seed must be taken from such select the best from near the edges. Test it thoroughly, find the per cent. of germinating grains and plant accordingly. The old-fashioned rule used to be:

One for the soil, two for the crow,
One for the wire worm and three to grow.
—New York Herald.

CHICKS IN THE GARDEN.—It is a very excellent practice to place newly hatched broods in an enclosed garden that the older fowls do not have access to. Confine the mother hen in a coop, which may be placed in the shade of any small fruit tree or bush. As chicks require soft and delicate food at first it is difficult to feed them if their coops are placed where the rest of the flock can pillage freely. The London Gardener's Chronicle speaks of the little chickens in the garden as follows: "They run about, doing no harm, their little bodies and feet leave no impression on the soil; they do not scratch, seem never dissatisfied, but find pleasure only in the pursuits of food or in basking in a warm corner in the sun's rays. While in this stage of infantile innocence the little creatures can in the garden perform a vast amount of good. Their little eyes spy out and little bills gather myriads of insects that are not easily visible to the human eye. Perhaps owing to the very minute nature of the food they gather, perhaps arising from their characteristic voracity, they are almost always roaming about and doing useful work. Meanwhile the clucking and anxious mother may be kept secure in a bottomed coop, which, removed here and there in the garden, will allow the chickens to enjoy fresh feeding each day."

BONE DUST AND WOOD ASHES.—An Indiana farmer gives the following result of an experiment with the above named fertilizers. He says: "I applied six hundred pounds of dry, unleached ashes to the acre, and sowed wheat on that, and the result was only six bushels to the acre. Adjoining this tract I drilled in two hundred pounds of bone dust, and the three acres produced twenty bushels to the acre, being an increased yield of fourteen bushels over the tract sown with wood ashes. The following year I used five hundred pounds of bone dust on the plot where I had previously sown six hundred pounds of ashes, and the result was forty bushels of wheat to the acre, being double what the bone produced alone. This experiment satisfied me that ashes alone or bone dust alone would not give me a yield that paid to any satisfaction. This acre with ashes yielded six bushels, the acre with bone dust yielded twenty bushels, but when the two were combined I harvested forty bushels. This shows what experiments and a small expenditure of money will do for the progressive farmer."

GOATS AS SHEEP PROTECTORS.—In some parts of the West goats are placed in sheep-pens to drive away wolves, a service for which their superior butting powers peculiarly fit them. The experiment has been tried in Hunterdon and Somerset counties, N. J., with complete success, as a protection for sheep against dogs. Two goats, it is said, can drive away a dozen dogs, and two are about all that it is necessary to keep with a moderate-sized flock. As soon as a dog enters the field at night the goats go at him, and send him rolling over in short order. A few doses of this heroic treatment prove quite enough for his dogship, and he is glad to limp howling away as best he can. Formerly, the farmers say, when a dog entered a sheep field at night, the timid creatures would run wildly about and cry piteously. Since the goats have been used to guard them, they form in line behind their sturdy defenders, and seem to enjoy the fun.

COOKING POULTRY.—Susan Burghee, in Country Gentleman, gives the following:

Roast Turkey or Chicken.—First the dressing must be carefully and properly done. It must not be scalded so much as to make the skin tender and pull to pieces. After the pin feathers are carefully plucked out and the hair singed off, loosen the crop all around with one finger and draw it out at the neck. Cut as little as possible. Wash, and while the fowl is wet rub outside and in with salt; also sift on a little pepper. Make a dressing of light stale bread. Beat up one or two eggs, according to quantity of stuffing desired; add a sifting of pepper, a little butter, sage, if liked, with enough milk or water to barely moisten. Crumb the bread and mix all together, but do not wash or press firmly. Fill the fowl, allowing room to swell. Sew up with a coarse thread, fill the neck and tie it. Have a very moderate fire, and let it get hot through before browning. The breast will be done when you can stick a fork into it without blood running, but sometimes the side will not be done so soon. Then cover the breast with thick paper, as it will not be juicy if roasted too much. Baste frequently. If the fowl is not fat it is well to lay a thin slice of pork across while roasting.

Turn several times. Young turkeys will roast well in about two hours. Chickens in less time. Old fowls require several hours, sometimes half a day. If very old they had better be boiled first for a time, then stuffed and baked. When done take the fowl from the pan, turn off most of the oil, add a heaping spoonful of flour, stirring it till smooth, in the pan, then add a pint or more of milk, and let it come to a boil. Chickens or turkeys which are very fat should have some of the surplus grease removed, enough will be left then.

Chickens Boiled.—Dress in the usual way. Cut off the neck, legs and wings, break the back in two, put into cold water till the animal heat is gone, then put into a kettle of cold water and boil till tender. Salt and pepper a little while before it is done. Boil the water nearly out. If the fowl is not fat, add a lump of butter. Mix a heaping spoonful of flour with one egg and a bowl of milk, add to the chicken and boil one minute.

Fried Chicken.—Chickens must be young to fry well. Dress and dissect as above. Rub in salt and a little pepper while wet. Have ready a skillet with about a fourth of an inch of lard over the bottom. Heat hot, lay in the pieces of chicken, and keep the dish covered. Mix one egg with an even spoonful of flour and a teacupful of milk, and pour over the chicken when done, setting the skillet in the oven long enough to cook the egg.

Chicken Pie.—Take two full-grown, but young chickens, disjoint them, and cut the backbone as small as convenient. Boil them in water enough to cover them. Let them boil still, quite tender; then take out the breast bone; after they come to a boil skim off all that rises. Now put in a little onion cut fine; not enough to taste distinctly; just enough to flavor. Rub some parsley very fine and scatter in. Season well with pepper and salt, and add a good-sized lump of butter. When all is cooked well, have liquid enough to cover the chicken; then beat up two eggs and stir in, also some sweet cream. Line a pan or large pudding-dish with a crust made as for biscuit, only more shortening; put in the chicken and liquid, then cover over with a crust the same as the lining, cutting a hole in the top. Bake till the crust is done.

Chicken Pot-Pie.—Wash and cut up chicken and put over in cold water to boil. If the chickens are young, boil about half an hour. Take them out, and wash out the kettle; now fry two or three slices of salt pork, and lay in the bottom of the kettle; lay over these the pieces of chicken and turn in about three pints of water, or more, according to quantity of chicken. Add butter the size of an egg, sift in a little pepper, and cover over with a light crust. Cook about one hour longer, being careful not to cook dry and scorch.

Chicken Pot-Pie, No. 2.—Cook the chickens till tender, leaving a good supply of broth in the kettle. Season this well and add a piece of butter as large as an egg, then thicken it with a heaping teaspoonful of flour stirred smooth in a little water, or with enough to make it a thin, rich gravy. Have ready a tin of good soda-biscuits just from the oven. Split each one through the center and lay into a deep platter or soup dish. Take up the chicken by itself and turn the gravy over the dish of biscuits. Let stand where hot for five or ten minutes before carrying to the table.

Chicken Broth.—Put two medium-sized chickens in a pot with a third of a teacupful of rice, and add six quarts of water. When it boils skim it, then let it boil slowly three or four hours longer, or till the meat falls from the bone. An hour before it is done put in one small onion and a couple of blades of mace. Just before it is done stir in a half a teacupful of sweet cream and shake a little pepper over all.

CRESS PIE.—For two pies take five eggs, three quarters of a cupful of butter, one cupful of powdered white sugar, and such flavoring as you prefer. Beat the yolks and sugar together until they are a perfect froth. Beat the butter until it is a creamy froth also. Now quickly add them together, flavoring with a little extract of vanilla. Bake it in a crust; it will rise very light. As soon as done have ready the whites of the eggs beaten to a froth, sweetened with a little sugar and flavored with a few drops of the extract. Spread this over the tops of the pies, which return to the oven to receive a delicate coloring. While hot, cut the pies and distribute them on the plates; otherwise, if they are allowed to cool without cutting them, they will fall. This is strange but true.

HOME-MADE CREAM CANDY.—To a coffee-cupful of white sugar add two tablespoonfuls of water to dissolve it, and boil without stirring in a bright tin pan until it will crisp in water like molasses candy. Just before it is done put in a teaspoonful of extract of vanilla or lemon, or peppermint essence, and a quarter of a teaspoonful of cream of tartar. When done pour into a buttered pan, and, when cool enough to handle, work it as you would molasses candy until it is perfectly white; then stretch and lay on a marble slab or moulding-board; with a chopping-knife cut in mouthfuls and lay it on buttered paper on a plate. When children want candy, by all means let them have that made at home, and they will not eat plaster of Paris.

A cup of hot water taken at bedtime is the best remedy for sleeplessness.

STRAW LUMBER.—We are in receipt, says a Kansas paper, from Mr. S. W. Hamilton, of Lawrence, Kan., of a sample of lumber made from straw, manufactured after a process patented by himself, the particulars of which he does not explain. He informs us, however, that he can manufacture lumber like the sample sent in any desired length from twelve feet upward and to thirty-two inches in width at a cost competing with the better or finishing grades of pine, although he does not inform us whether this competition will apply equally to sections where lumber is comparatively cheap, as at Chicago, and at Western grain producing points, as at Kansas. We imagine, however, that the expense will vary but little at any point where straw is obtainable in large quantities. The manufacture is, of course, confined to a grade which will complete with the better class of lumber, as there would be no object in filling the new product with knots, and shakes would scarcely be obtainable even if desired, while sap and decayed wood must be impossibilities. The sample sent to us will hold a nail as well as wood, is equally susceptible to a high painting finish, and can be polished to as high a degree as is at all desirable. Being made waterproof we can discover no possible reason why it should not be as durable as pine or even oak, or even more so, while its adaptability is evidently as great for roofing purposes as for the fine work of a dwelling. The question of cost appears to us to be the most important element yet to be practically solved. We can see no reason why it is not susceptible of being worked under the plane or other ordinary tools of the carpenter, and when once fitted to its place we can readily believe that it will be free from shrinkage and swelling. In appearance the sample before us resembles hard wood, being about as dark as oak and more dense in texture, with a specific gravity one-fifth greater than thoroughly seasoned black walnut. For finishing purposes it will not, as a rule, be necessarily as thick as ordinary lumber, its tensile strength being apparently double that of wood of the same thickness. On the whole, we are favorably impressed with the appearance of the new artificial lumber.

WATER IN DISEASE.—Dr. S. G. Webber, in the Archives of Medicine for August, attributes a considerable value to water as a preventive and a remedy of disease, and opposes the abstinence from drinking at meals, advocated by many, as injurious. Among patients who have come under Dr. Webber's care affected with "symptoms of an undefined character, a vague unrest and disquiet showing itself by discomfort or even pain, sometimes in one place, sometimes in another," with constipation, and an unhealthy hue of the skin, he has found that many were accustomed to take less than the usual average quantity of drink. In such cases he would prescribe an increased quantity of drink, with beneficial effects in increased perspiration, and the decrease of disappearance of the unpleasant symptoms. The waste of tissue-changes in the system passes into the blood, and leaves the system only in solution. This, Dr. Webber maintains, can not take place unless enough water is taken. Further, "water taken with the food favors digestion; when taken into the stomach, a part is absorbed by the gastric vessels, carrying with it the soluble constituents of the food. So much as is not immediately absorbed assists in softening and breaking up the larger particles of food, and thus aids in the gastric digestion by facilitating the action of the gastric fluids." It also makes it easier to keep the bowels regular. In estimating the quantity of water to be taken daily, we should remember that water is excreted by the lungs and skin, as well as by the kidneys, and that much food contains water. Hence the amount required must vary slightly with the activity of the skin and the character of the food. Dalton states that the average amount is about fifty-two ounces, or 3.38 pints, or the equivalent of eight or nine coffee-cups, of drink.—Popular Science Monthly.

PRESERVATION OF CROSS TIES.—Col A. Hauson, superintendent of the Texas Central railroad, has had creosoting works constructed at Houston, for treating cross ties, with a capacity of seven hundred and sixty pieces a day. The reservoir tanks are three in number, and will contain four thousand barrels of crude oil. The cost of this oil is eleven cents in Galveston. The cost of each tie, when creosoted, is $1 10. The tanks are constructed of brick and Portland cement. The timber is loaded upon low tramway cars. These are drawn by machinery and an endless chain into the reservoir cylinders, which are then sealed, and the process is therein completed, after which the cars are withdrawn. In the yards of the company are immense quantities of bridge timber and ties awaiting treatment. One of the advantages of this process is the fact that the common loblolly pine, which is regarded of so little value, and which exists in immense quantities in Eastern Texas and throughout many parishes in Louisiana, is the most suitable wood for creosoting, as it requires an open perous timber and rapid treatment.

MARKING INK.—A good recipe for making indelible aniline black ink, for use in marking linen with a pen is to dissolve 1 oz. of cuprie chloride in 3½ oz. of common salt, and 1½ oz. aqua ammonia (C. P.) One volume of this solution is then mixed with four parts of a solution prepared as follows: Aniline hydrochlorate, 3½ oz.; distilled water, 2½ oz.; gum arabic solution (gum 1 oz., water 2 oz.,) 2½ oz.; glycerine, 1½ oz. The greenish liquid resulting is an excellent indelible ink for linen, although the characters written with it do not develop a good black color until after exposure to the air for a day or two if not hot pressed.

Here is Pusher's formula for a similar ink: Dissolve four parts of aniline black in sixteen parts by weight of alcohol, with sixty drops of strong (pure) hydrochloric acid, and dilute the dark blue solution with ninety parts by weight of water in which six parts of gum arabic have been previously dissolved.

COLORED PHOTOGRAPHS.—To obtain colored photographs, Mr. J. Albert takes three negatives of the object, taking care to exclude the yellow, blue, and red rays in the three cases, respectively. The negatives are taken off on chromogelatine films and printed in yellow, blue, and red. Thus three pictures of all that is yellow, blue, or red in the object are obtained. If printed over each other on white paper, all the colors of the original objects are reproduced.

A Dream of Warning

BY L. W. COOPER.

No doubt dreams are produced by various causes, to wit: The Holy Spirit, Satan, intensity of thought, grief, excessive joy and a disordered stomach. That was a charming record of a dream which appeared in the February No. of Dr. Sledd's Monthly. I read it with intense interest. Rev. Preston Cooper had many dreams after his conversion. His conversion was a powerful conversion. His consecration to God was thorough. He lived in the sublime element of faith. Rev. H. H. Montgomery who was a dear and true friend of my father related the following to me: "A Christian lady was in a dying condition—all had given up hope, and the doctor had left her to die, and as he was going home he met my father and the question was asked, "How is your patient?" the reply was, she is dying, there is not a shadow of hope. My father spoke as follows: she shall not die; I will not let her; is it not written if you ask any thing in my name it shall be done unto you? God has answered my prayer. He visited the dying lady, and before leaving told her family she would not die. She recovered; the doctor, her family, the lady, and all who knew of her sickness, regarded her recovery from the chamber of death as the special answer to prayer.

To his dreams: Cooper's well stands to-day as a witness to the truth and fulfillment of his dreams. Whilst living at the well he had important business at Clinton and Bolton, and only a part of a day in which to attend to his business, and one of the plans must be rejected until another time." In the evening he remarked, he was in trouble as he had important business at two places next day, and he did not know how to act. That night he dreamed not to go to Clinton. He did not go, but next day proceeded to Bolton, and after finishing his business he went to the depot to take the train for Vicksburg, when he learned there had been a wreck of the train between Clinton and Bolton, and in all probability, if my father had gone to Clinton he would have lost his life. These dreams seemed to throw a bright light over his pathway. He seemed to live in the joyous supernatural. They seemed to him as voices speaking to him from the mysterious realm of life and love. They augmented his faith, and his consecration some thought bordered on fanaticism. But the success of his ministry, the strength of his mind, the purity of his life, and the grand test of all men, the culminating period—the period we call death, showed there was no fanaticism in his heart. He lived in the immediate presence of Christ, and his death was peaceful, triumphant, beautiful, and as glorious as the death of the pure infant. There was no death for him. My father had a dream that threw a mantle of sorrow over his last years. The dream changed his countenance, his preaching, his manners, the ringing laughter, and the humorous conversation to which he was given. At the time of this sad dream, he was in charge of the church in Vicksburg and he resided at Cooper's Well. A young man joined the Alabama Conference the same year he did, they became devoted friends. My father's friend was highly educated, accomplished in manners, and a good preacher. After a few years my father was transferred to the Mississippi Conference and his friend remained in the Alabama Conference. My father soon learned that his friend was drinking, and step by step he lost his influence, his religion, his character. My father did not forget his old friend, but desiring to help him build up his character he wrote to him to come to Mississippi and he would assist him in securing a school. My father's friend came, and the school was secured. For a time there seemed to be a hope for the fallen minister of Christ. The rebellious angels were driven out of heaven. What a fall! A place so pure, so happy, so bright and beautiful for one so dark, so hopeless and full of curses. A fallen minister! Driven in his own wickedness and shame away from the cross of Christ. He joined the church. He and my father were often together. They talked of the golden happy days, when they went out into the world to preach Christ. They had had different experiences. One was living under the very shadow of the cross of Christ, and his sun was going down in a clear bright sky; whilst the other was wandering afar off in the cold, cold world of evil and human depravity, and the sun of his life was going down in gloom and shame. One walked on the sea of life in view of the eternal haven of peace, and the other wrecked in mid ocean, and all was gone, hope, character, and heaven. The rays of life that seemed to gather around the life of my father's friend soon faded, and he soon gave up all hope. When my father left him to fill his appointment in Vicksburg his friend was in feeble though usual health. While in Vicksburg he dreamed his friend was dead. He saw the body cold in death; the spirit of his friend came to him; the impression of despair was on his spirit. He showed my father a long roll of preachers whom my father had known while living, and under the names of some who were the brightest lights in the church was written, "in hell." The spirit told my father he was lost because he had been recreant to his holy trust, and added "Bro. Cooper, you are safe thus far, but beware of popularity. Do not let popularity ruin you." My father had this dream three distinct times during the night, and next day he left for his friends house and found him dying, and everything seemed to be a fulfillment of his dreams, "Do not let popularity ruin you" never died from my father's ears. What did this dream mean? Was it true? To human appearance it was. But I trust Christ pardoned his disgraced servant, and when my father passed into the bright beyond, they met to talk over his redeeming love.

Popping the Question.

A gentleman had been long paying attentions to a young lady whom he was very anxious to marry, but to whom he had never ventured to declare his passion. When opportunity offered, his courage deserted him, and when he resolved to speak, the fair one never could be found alone or disengaged. Driven to desperation, he one day succeeded in accomplishing his purpose, in a somewhat remarkable manner, at a dinner-party. To most people a dinner party would hardly seem the most suitable occasion for overtures of this description, especially when, as in this instance, the lady is seated at the opposite side of the table from her admirer. The latter, however, was equal to the occasion. Tearing a leaf from his pocket-book, he wrote on it, under cover of the table, "Will you be my wife? Write 'Yes' or 'No'" at the foot of this."

Calling a servant, he asked him in a whisper to take the slip, which of course was carefully folded and directed, to "the lady in blue opposite." The servant did as requested, and the gentleman, in an agony of suspense, watched him give it to the lady, and fixed his eyes, with badly disguised eagerness, to try and judge by her expression how the quaintly-made offer was received. He had forgotten one thing, namely, that ladies seldom carry pencils about at a dinner-party. The beloved one was, however, not to be baffled by so trifling an obstacle. After reading the note calmly, she turned to the servant, and said: "Tell the gentleman, Yes." They were married in due course.

When Prof. Aytoun was wooing Miss Wilson, daughter of Prof. Wilson, the famous "Christopher North," he obtained the lady's consent conditionally on that of her father's being secured. This Aytoun was too shy to ask, and prevailed upon the young lady, herself to confide the necessary negotiations. "We must deal tenderly with his feelings," said glorious old Christopher. "I'll write my reply on a slip of paper, and pin it to the back of your frock."

"Jane's answer is on the back of my dress," said Miss Jane as she entered the drawing-room. Turning her round, the delighted professor read these words, "With the author's compliments."

In Lord Beaconsfield's last novel, an eccentric old nobleman pops the question in the following matter-of-fact language: "I wonder if anything would ever induce you to marry me?" This was evidently intended as a fresh illustration of Lord Montford's eccentricity; but it is really much nearer the terms in which the average man proposes, than is the average proposal of the novelist. The Americans, we know, carry everything to extremes; and we are told, that the New York young men have reduced the formula of the proposition to a couple of words; "Let's consolidate." Nothing, however, could be neater or more ingenious than the proposal of the Irishman, who thus addressed the rustic beauty upon whom he had set his affections: "Biddy, darlint, they've been tellin' me there's too many of us in the world. Now, if you'll me get the praste to make us two wan, troth an' wouldn't there be wan the less."

Different customs prevail in different countries on this as in other matters. A curious ceremony, for example, is associated with popping the question among the Samoyedes of Russia. When a young Samoyede desires to marry, and has come to an understanding with the damsel of his choice, he visits her father, and, with a short stick, taps him, and then the mother of the maiden, on the shoulder. He then demands the girl in marriage, and offers the father and mother a glass of vodka which he has brought with him. As a token of his good-will, the father drinks the vodka; he tells the young man he has no objection, but that he must ask the girl's consent. A few days later the young man comes again, this time accompanied by what servants he has, and provided with plenty of vodka. His retinue remain outside, while he enters the room and seats himself by the side of his lady-love. The father hands the young man a glass of vodka; he drinks half, and hands the half-full glass, under his left arm, to the girl, who finishes the draught. The father then gives his daughter a glass of vodka; and she in like manner drinks half of it, and presents the remainder, with her left hand under her right arm, to her lover, who drains the glass. After this the father hands a piece of raw meat to the young man, who eats it, and then takes a piece from the floor, eats half, and presents the other half, under his left arm, to the girl, who finishes the draught. The father then gives his daughter a glass of vodka; and she in like manner drinks half of it, and presents the remainder, with her left hand under her right arm, to the young man to finish. This extraordinary ceremonial would appear to complete the transaction, and may be regarded as synonymous with our engagements. The feasting and other ritual necessary to ratify the contract generally take place soon or immediately afterward.

"So you would not take me to be twenty?" said a young lady to her partner. "What would you take me for then?" "For better, for worse," replied he; and he was accepted. Here is another case in point. Riding home from the hounds after a certain famous county meet, a lady observed to her companion, "Why should we not marry, Sir John?" "Ah!" said Sir John, "that is what I have often thought myself." And married they were.—Chambers' Journal.

Japan, as is well known, is the paradise of childhood. By the kindness of the author of "Child Life in Japan" we are enabled to print a cradle-song in the original:

"Nen-ne ko yo—nen-ne ko yo
Neo-ite no mori wa doko ye yuku
Ama yama koyete sato ye yuki
Sato no miyage ni inu-i morota
Ten-ten taiku ni—sho no tsiye
Oki-agari kobo-shima ho hari-ko."

Signifying in English:

"Lullaby, baby; lullaby, baby!
Baby's nursery, where has she gone?
Over those mountains she's gone to her village,
And from her village what will she bring?
A humdum drum and a bamboo flute,
A 'daruma,' (which will never turn over,) and a paper dog."

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S —MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

AN EDITOR'S OPINION.

An editorial friend of ours, who has grown enthusiastic over a certain remedy which has cured him of dyspepsia, general debility and nervousness, writes an editorial as follows: "We believe that Brown's Iron Bitters are destined to be the medicine of the world. They give real health and strength to every part of the body, restore every lost or impaired organic function, and give new life and new vigor to every phisical and mental faculty. Every man and woman in ill-health should rejoice that a real cure lies in Brown's Iron Bitters."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4.—The water is four feet three inches above the high water mark of 1874. From seven A. M. of the third to seven P. M. of the fourth the rise was one-quarter of an inch and the bayou has been stationary up to five minutes past nine this evening. It is rumored that the water has fallen several inches between Begga' and Garland's, but as yet nothing definite can be obtained. There are between five hundred and six hundred refugees here at present, and they are still coming in. Large loads of stock continue to arrive daily, but after being brought here they are so weak and exhausted that many of them die. There are a great many dead sheep and cattle on the banks of the bayou almost in a decomposed condition. The only dry spot between this place and the mouth of the Courtableau, a distance of forty odd miles, is on the St. Lucie plantation, which is situated about three miles east of Washington.

MORGAN CITY, La., April 4.—The morning brings tidings of new disasters, more suffering and greater dangers. People who retired to rest upon the elevated floors of their dwellings awoke to find the flood sweeping over the planks—water, water everywhere. The only remaining land visible is that upon the new railroad track to the bridge, and the old fort flats have been in use to-day, taking goods from the stores. The depot is being used as a place of refuge for several colored families.

WASHINGTON, April 4.—The President to-day sent to the Senate a message vetoing the Chinese bill.

WASHINGTON, April 5.—The Republican Senators to-day tried hard to evade the issue on the Chinese veto. Many of them opposed the consideration of the subject, but by a heavy vote the Senate decided to take it up. Mr. Sherman then moved to refer the veto message and accompanying papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations. This was supported by Mr. Sherman and opposed by Messrs. Morgan, Garland and Bayard. Mr. Sherman's speech showed that he felt the stress of his position. The Republicans generally were uneasy. The motion to refer to the committee was lost by a decisive vote, and the question then came on the passage of the bill. The ayes twenty-nine and the nays twenty-one. All the negative votes were Republicans, including Mr. David Davis, who may be regarded as a regular adherent of that organization. The Republicans who voted to pass the bill over the President's veto were Cameron, of Wisconsin, Hill, of Colorado, Jones, of Nevada, Miller, of California, and Miller, of New York. This, of course, defeats the bill lately passed. Mr. Miller, of California, and his colleague, Mr. Farley, have each brought in new bills,—one for ten years' suspension and the other for sixteen. There is a chance that one of these bills may pass and be signed.

WASHINGTON, April 6.—The President to-day sent to the Senate the following nominations: H. M. Teller, of Colorado, to be Secretary of the Interior; William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, Secretary of the Navy; Wm. H. Hunt, of Louisiana, to be Minister to Russia; John J. Knox, of Minnesota, Comptroller of the Currency. (A renomination, his term having expired.)

The Senate, in executive session, unanimously confirmed the nomination of H. M. Teller, and refer the others to appropriate committees. The President also nominated Roland Worthington, editor and proprietor of the Boston Traveler, to be Collector of Customs of Boston.

LITTLE ROCK, April 7.—Crop estimates received from Fort Smith show that about one-tenth of the tillable soil of Northwestern Arkansas has been sown with wheat. The acreage of corn has been increased fully twenty-five per cent., while that of cotton is at least fifteen per cent. less than before. Farmers are paying much more attention this season to grasses and cereals. The present condition of crops is all that could be desired.

WASHINGTON, April 7.—Western dispatches report a series of tornadoes yesterday at different points from Kansas to Michigan, attended by some remarkable evidences of the power of the wind. Houses were destroyed in many places in Kansas, Iowa, Illinois and Michigan, and lives were lost in all those States.

PORT ALLEN, April 8.—Decline in river increasing daily. Back water falling.

Says the Vicksburg Herald, of April 7, in the same vein:

The river is receding slowly but steadily, and the high places along the river front are being disclosed more and more daily. Vicksburg and Meridian trains resumed their trips to the Elevator yesterday for the first time since the high water cut off the connection. The Elevator is also approachable now for pedestrians from the north end as well as at the south. A great deal of water rests upon the tillable land of this section, but, as the river is rapidly receding, planting has commenced in many sections, and in less than three weeks the overflow will be a thing of the past. Except in the loss of hogs, cattle, etc., it will not operate as a detriment to the land or the country. Of course on some land there will be little or no crops made, but these are exceptions rather than the rule.

GALVESTON, April 8.—Last night a passenger train on the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe railroad was boarded near Blum Station, Hill county, and the passengers robbed by five unmasked men.

WASHINGTON, April 8.—Senator Lamar is about to leave for Mississippi for the purpose of carrying home Mrs. Lamar, whose health is very seriously impaired. It is hoped that the change of climate may restore her health.

SALT LAKE CITY, April 8.—The Mormon Spring Conference adjourned to-day. There has been much talk of the former persecutions of the Saints, always resulting, they say, to their advantage in the end. From this they draw strength to meet the persecution, as they call it, contemplated by the Edmunds bill. There is new pressure which the Mormons propose to bring to bear, not to trade with Gentiles. A secret meeting of business men was held yesterday, at which stringent pledges to that effect were signed. The Gentiles say if they could not be broken down fifty years ago nor since, they can not now.

MEMPHIS, April 10.—For twenty-four hours ending to-day at noon the river here has declined ten inches. Old steamboatmen say by Saturday next the river will be within its banks all the way between Cairo, Ill., and Greenville, Miss.

VICKSBURG, April 10.—The total fall of the river is five feet. The decline is not so rapid as heretofore, being about two inches per day. Laborers and mules are being rapidly returned to the plantations in this valley, and planting will go on without further interruption.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN, April 5.—The North German Gazette, discussing the silver question, recommends that the authority which was voted in the Bundesroth to withdraw thaier pieces from circulation, or place them on the same footing as coins of baser metals, be revoked; that gold and paper currency below the value of twenty marks be called in, and that silver alone be used for the payment of amounts below that sum. In conclusion, the Gazette says that the gold currency must be placed on a sound basis, and silver reinstated in its former position.

A meeting of detectives was held Monday to consider the best means of severing the German Socialists from the Nihilists.

ALGIERS, April 7.—A French column has overtaken Bou Amena's forces, south of Fignig, and completely defeated them, capturing his provision train and twenty-six of his women. Almost all of his fighting men were killed or captured. Bou Amena escaped.

TUNIS, April 7.—News has been received from Gabes that nearly all the insurgents in Southern Tunis will take refuge in Tripolitan territory.

BERLIN, April 8.—Another dynamite mine has been discovered beneath the Nicholoi railway at the fourth station from Moscow. Many persons have been arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the plot.

CITY OF MEXICO, April 8.—The following example has been set in the Federal District and a few other cities. The Vera Cruz Council have prohibited bull fighting within the city limits.

State of the Rivers.

The Mississippi River is getting some accessions out of the Missouri where there is a four foot rise, and out of the Tennessee where there is a ten foot rise at Nashville. At St. Louis the river rose one foot, at Cairo five inches, at Memphis it fell eleven inches, at Vicksburg the fall was one foot eight inches, while at New Orleans it was stationary at thirteen inches below the flood mark of 1874. The Red at Shreveport fell six inches, and the Arkansas at Little Rock fell two inches.

Everywhere in Northern Louisiana the backwater in the country is declining, but not so rapidly as in the main rivers. In Southern Louisiana the flood has about culminated, although it has not ceased to damage the plantations exposed to its force and violence. There are numerous settlements remote from the main centre of the inundating waters, but nevertheless accessible to them, and time was required for the flood wave to reach them. Wherever this has taken place within the past few days disaster has followed. On Sunday the water in Bayous Terrebonne and Black broke over the ridge that separated them from Bayou du Large, which flows through Terrebonne parish southward to the Gulf of Mexico, and submerged about a dozen plantations which make some two thousand hogsheads of sugar and a considerable quantity of rice. The planters there had been trying to dam out this water for some days, but it broke down their defenses and put their lands under the waves. Some further damage is reported to lands in the neighborhood of Terrebonne station, but the general belief is that the waters have done their worst from there to Morgan city, and that planters will have to wait with patience for the floods to run down. Should this take place at the rate at which the water rose, then patience will have her perfect work indeed, for the decline will be slow.—New Orleans Picayune, April 11.

An earthquake was reported in Costa Rica March 16, extending from Cartago, at the dividing ridge between the two oceans, to the Pacific coast. Three churches and a number of dwelling houses were ruined in Cartago. In San Jose, Alajuela, Grecia and San Roman, public and private buildings were shaken down or otherwise damaged, and in Punta Arenas a port on the Pacific, the upheaval occasioned some damage. The famous volcano, Irazu, which has been quiet for years, although with fires eternally smouldering in its crater, is credited with this unwonted disturbance. No loss of life is reported.

DON'T NEGLECT THE GARDEN.—No part of the farm pays better than the land devoted to the garden, yet on no part is the work more grudgingly given. Often it will be true economy to have an acre or two less of wheat, or other field crop, and invest the labor that would have been given to these upon the garden. When farmers learn that a constant diet of corned beef and cabbage, varied by pork and beans—both excellent in their way—can be easily varied by many other, and not more costly form of food, we shall hear less of the question: "How to keep boys on the farm?" and in other forms of food, we include an ample supply of fruits.—American Agriculturist.

Mr. James B. Bailey, of Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "Of all men born to suffer, I think I have had my fullest share; from my fourteenth year I have been a miserable invalid. When twenty-six years of age, I felt I was sixty. My troubles made me unfit for business or pleasure. A year ago I tried Brown's Iron Bitters, and now in my twenty-seventh year I feel myself for once in my life, 'A perfect man.'"

DISTRICT CONFERENCES.

The District Conference, Brandon District, Mississippi Conference, will meet at Morton, July 7, at 9 A. M. I hope the pastors will have written reports. Bro. C. McDonald will preach the opening sermon.

USE THE GLASSES.

A WONDER

SCIENTIFIC

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight; if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

THE VOICES OF THE FLOWERS.

"Lie still with your ears to the soft green earth,
While the rain and sunshine fall,
And you can hear the flowers in their gay, glad mirth
To each other whisper and call.

"For hush'd like an infant, in sleep they lie,
In their moist, cool cells below;
Aware of hearing the wind's bleak sigh,
And the falling of the snow.

"But when spring comes down to the earth, and her feet
Send a thrill through the woodland and plain,
And the clouds weep tears that are soft and sweet,
But which we miscall the rain,

"Then they waken up with a light in their look,
And in low, sweet whispers they cry,
'Sisters, a murmur is heard in the brook,
And sunshine is seen in the sky.

"'Then we should burst through the young, green earth,
As the stars through the heavens by night,
As the young and the glad may rejoice in our birth,
And we in the calm, sweet light.'

Then she said: "Sisters, where shall we grow?
I shall grow by the side of the stream,
And all day long I will blossom and blow
Till the news fold me up in a dream."

And I," said another, "will bloom by the way
Where the children go in a band;
They will stop for a moment their gladsome play,
And touch my lips with their hand."

"I will peep from the long, rich grass," said one,
When the meadows low to the wind,
And I will catch like dewdrops the fairy tune
Of the music it leaves behind."

"And I," said one, "in some garden fair,
Where my fairer sisters abide;
I shall may be that I may be twined in the hair
Of the maid as she blooms into bride."

Then a sweeter voice held the rest in thrall—
"O, sisters, what things ye have said!
I shall grow in the sweetest spot of all
On the graves of the calm, pure dead.

"They will know that I blossom above their dust,
And will yearn, in their silent abode,
For the grand resurrection to crown their trust
In the love and the promise of God."

The flowers whisper, and if you list,
When the rain and sunshine fall,
You will hear their sweet counsel and make reply
If your heart is at one with all.

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LASMITH.

Fourth Letter.

My Dear Young Friends: It has generally been supposed, by people in America and Europe, that the Chinese have an antiquity which extends back myriads of years; that their historical records stretch back far into the past, and that their records differ very widely from those given by Moses. This idea was at one time caught up by sceptics, and used by them to cast discredit on the chronology of the Bible, and thereby overthrow the evidence of its Divine authority. The truth of the whole matter is, the Chinese, like most all heathen nations, have a mythological as well as a chronological period. The one they look upon as fabulous, the other as authentic; the one as counted with the gods, and the other with men. They give no names, no characters, no events and no circumstances connected with these wonderful emperors; neither are we told of any events that occurred during their reigns. We are not told whether their kingdoms were in heaven or on earth, or whether they reigned in China or over other nations. All this may point to an indistinct tradition of the antediluvian world when men lived to so great an age, and it is easy to see how the Chinese, who have been for so many thousand years entirely shut out from any intercourse with all other nations, might have been led to look upon all that transpired before the flood as being connected with the gods. So little do the Chinese credit this fabulous period, that one of their most noted historians, Choo-foo-tsz, does not make any mention of it. Another historian says: "Such an account is contrary to reason and common sense." Another historian, Sze-ma-Tseen, makes no mention of these emperors, and says not a word about Pankoo, the first man.

The Chinese have a correct history of their nation which extends over a period of four thousand years, in which they relate not only all important events, but many very trivial. A record of this history can be found in all the principal cities of China, and this is the one which is generally received and believed in. More than two thousand five hundred years since the Chinese had a written language, and a lexicon of their language was formed then, but was more fully compiled by one of their emperors about one hundred and fifty years since, and is still in use, containing a list of about forty thousand characters. Long before Abraham left Ur, of the Chaldees, Chinese were acquainted with astronomy, and recorded many important observations which have been verified by late scientific astronomers.

When the Israelites dwelt in Egypt, Chinese laws and literature equalled that of the Egyptians. More than a thousand years before the Christian era the Emperor of China, Wung-Wong, composed classics which are committed to memory by all scholars in China to this day. Her literature was very extensive long before England was invaded by the Norman conquerors. The Chinese used firearms about fourteen centuries ago, and printing was known in China five hundred years before it was known in the West. They knew how to make paper as early as the second century of the Christian era, and invented gun-powder a century previous to that time. More than eighteen hundred years since, the Chinese sold their silks to the Romans for its weight in gold, and they dressed in the same when the people of ancient Britain painted themselves in all fantastic colors, dressed in skins, and fished in canoes made of bark.

Before America was discovered China had a canal six hundred and fifty miles long, and two hundred and twenty years before the Christian era she had a gigantic wall, extending from the seashore to the west across the highest mountains, fifteen hundred miles in length. It is broad enough at the top to allow twelve men to walk abreast. It is said to have material enough to build a wall five feet high entirely around the earth. It is a wonderful work of industry, far surpassing that of the wonderful pyramids of Egypt. More of this in the future.

There is no other nation in the world which can show such an unbroken history as the Empire of China. Her civilization of to-day is intimately connected with her civilization of the past. She has at present more than seventeen hundred walled cities, which, if placed in a straight line, would extend nearly three times across the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There are more than two thousand canals, which, connecting with all her principal rivers, drain and irrigate almost all parts of China, from the gates of the great city of Peking to Hungchow, in the southwest, and to Canton, on her most southern border. Goods and passengers can be transported from the city of Peking to nearly every large city and town in the empire by the means of these extensive canals.

China proper is divided into eighteen states, or provinces, as follows:

Northern.—1. Kan-suh, meaning willing reverence, and has a population of 16,000,000.

2. Shensi, meaning west passes, and has a population of 14,500,000.

3. Shansi, meaning west hills, and has a population of 15,500,000.

4. Honau means river south, and has a population of 25,500,000.

Central China.—5. Sz-chwen, meaning four streams, and has a population of 27,000,000.

6. Hu-Peh means north lake, and contains a population of 24,500,000.

7. Klangsi means river west, and contains a population of 21,000,000.

8. Gau-hwuy means grace province, and contains a population of 20,000,000.

Southern China.—9. Yun-nan means cloudy south, and contains a population of 8,000,000.

10. Kwee-chow means noble land, and contains a population of 7,500,000.

11. Hu-nau means south lake, and contains a population of 25,500,000.

12. Kwangsi means broad west, and contains a population of 10,500,000.

13. Kwangtung means broad east, and contains a population of 10,500,000.

14. Foh-klen means happy established, and contains a population of 15,000,000.

15. Cher-klang means forked streams, and contains a population of 28,000,000.

16. Kling-su means river province, and contains a population of 35,000,000.

17. Shing-ting means east hills, and contains a population of 29,000,000.

18. Chili-Li means direct rule, and contains a population of 28,000,000. Making a grand total of 370,000,000.

A glance at the map of China proper shows that it extends over an immense area of country thickly inhabited and well cultivated. Revolutions and wars have often occurred in China. She has been frequently invaded by a foreign foe, or disturbed by internal commotion, and her people are now under Tartar rule. Notwithstanding all this, China remains the same. The genius and spirit are the same as they were three or four thousand years since in the patriarchal age. No nation has undergone less change than China. The people of this great empire seem to have grown up a distinct people from the rest of mankind, almost as different as if they were the inhabitants of another planet. They have a remarkable history. The coincidence of ten generations having passed away, the institution of marriage, the invention of music, the rebellion of a portion of the human race, and the confessed mixture of the divine and human families, closed by the occurrence of the flood in the time of Zaou (Noah), all mentioned in Chinese history—might lead us to infer that, in their allusions to this period, the Chinese are merely giving their version of the events that occurred from Adam to Noah. When Yu, the first Emperor of China, ascended the throne, the lands were drained and China became habitable. About this time wine was discovered. Emperor Zu tasted it and found it sweet, but objected to it, saying, "At some future period wine will occasion the ruin of the country."

An account of the discovery of wine, in connection with the facts related above, would seem to prove that the first emperors of China must have been acquainted with the immediate descendants of Noah. Of Ching-Tang, the founder of the second dynasty, B. C. 1765, history says, "He ruled the people gently, and abolished oppression, complying with the wishes of the people, so that all parties resorted to him." In his days the seven years' drought occurred. At the close of this dynasty, B. C. 1153, the tyrant, Chow, was ruler. He is said to have been endowed with supernatural strength, so that he was able to conquer the fiercest beast, and yet he was deluded and ruined through the fascinations and extravagances of a wretched woman. It is very remarkable that the age and character of this ruler should agree so perfectly with that given in the sacred Scriptures to Samson.

Some three centuries before the Christian era the people of this great empire were brought under the rule of the Tsin family. It is from this family the name "China" was given to the country by the Romans; but that name is not recognized by the Chinese. Mencius, a Chinese philosopher, wrote, "I hear of barbarians being improved by the Chinese; but I have never heard of the Chinese being improved by barbarians." Thus the Tartars, after subjugating China two hundred and fifty years since, instead of altering her institutions and changing her form of government, conformed themselves to the customs and laws already existing, and were in fact subdued by the Chinese. There are three classes in China who have never submitted to the Tartar rule: the women, young children and the priesthood. Their garments are the same to-day as they were worn in the late dynasty. China has remained the same, only changing her rulers and adding to her territory, until now the whole empire covers an area of three million square miles. No wonder the Chinese consider their country the "middle kingdom," and that with them the world and their empire should mean the same thing.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, February 20, 1882.

Frivolity and Waste.

A fashion craze is at its height. Surely women were never so extravagant and reckless in their expenditures as now. The mania spreads to all classes. Rebounding from the forced economy that the financial crisis brought upon all, they seem to throw off all restraints. It is not the young women alone or the idle, frivolous class who do nothing but read novels and fashion books and costume themselves; but the aged and the mothers and the little children; not the rich alone, but the working classes and the poor. Go where you will, you find a grand dress parade; women lent with the weight of years bedecked in the latest style, mothers arrayed in all the vanities that fashion-mongers can heap up, and little tots who can hardly read dressed like little princesses, indeed, more expensively than the prospective queen of England, Alexandra, dresses her daughters. Thousands of these women are not able to afford it. They are living up to their entire income, and a reverse in the wheel of fortune would at once prostrate them. A temporary check in any one branch of business would bring them to face the question of getting the daily bread. And their children are growing up with false notions of life, with false ideas of the value of money, with prejudices against economy and labor. They are trained not to do, but to shine. One is reminded of De Quincy's picture of a woman sailing over the sea. She is asleep. Her necklace of pearls is broken and the jewels are dropping one by one into the sea. She wakes at last to see her jewels dropping away from her; she clutches after them, but while she is trying to recover a falling pearl another drops away. These jewels of the home are dropping away while the mother sleeps. What kind of wives and mothers will the pampered girls of fashion make? They have not been educated for the practical duties of life. They go to meet the solemn responsibilities of wifehood and motherhood weak and ignorant. They blunder from the first; shine a little while if kept in a sheltered nook, but the first storm beats them down and leaves them wrecked.

The morgues of our great cities tell the sad story of the tragic ending of many of this useless, frivolous class. Many are already in the black seething floods of vice that sweep down to death. So many that if one girl is brought from the river or the street and laid out in the morgue for identification by friends, at once there is a long procession of anxious, weeping fathers and mothers, whose darlings have drifted away from them out into the slums of vice, who stand by the dead and with stormy grief try to find some trace of the lost one they mourn.

What we need now most of all is strong, heroic mothers, who have the will and strength to conscientiously breast these waves of vanity and fashionable frivolity and hold, like a sheet anchor, their children to economy through culture and practical hard work. Oh, for true, sensible, practical, conscientious, Christian mothers.—The Christian Woman.

Power of Christ Through Infirmity.

It is not only in the duties of active life that a man receives the mark of Christ, and enters into the liberty which he bestows. The same liberation sometimes comes by sickness and the incapacity for work. I can speak, perhaps, more clearly, if I picture to myself some one on whom that calamity has fallen. For years you have been doing your part in the world. You have held your own. You have asked nothing, you have taken nothing from your fellow-men. But suddenly, it may be, the blow has fallen upon you. Sickness has come. You can not work. You are dependent where you used to trust only in yourself. How terrible it is! How it seems as if now all liberty were gone. You must stretch out your hand in your blindness for somebody to lead you. You must open your helpless mouth for somebody to feed you. Life seems all slavery and uselessness. What can release you? If it should come to pass that, by your pain, you should be brought into a personal knowledge of him who can console your pain; that by your weakness you could be brought to a personal reliance on his strength, and so your pain and weakness could become to you profoundly and inseparably associated with your allegiance to him—then see! Would they not be transformed? Still you must rest on others for what you would gladly do for yourself. But it would be no enfeeblement, no demoralization of your life. The higher meaning of your pain would swallow up its lower meaning. The association which it made for you with God would overrule the association which it made for you with your brethren. Through him on whom it made you able to rely, you would be strengthened so that even those on whom you rested physically every day would feel your strength, and spiritually rest on you. That would be freedom for you.

Such sicknesses there are. Such we have sometimes known; some men or women, helpless so that their lives seemed to be all dependent, who yet, through their sickness, had so mounted to a higher life and so identified themselves with Christ that those on whom they rested found the Christ in them, and rested upon it. Their sick-rooms became churches. Their weak voices spoke gospels. The hands they seemed to clasp were really clasping theirs. They were dependent on while they seemed the most dependent. And when they died, when the faint flicker of their life when out, strong men whose light seemed radiant found themselves walking in the darkness, and stout hearts on which theirs used to lean trembled as if the staff and substance of their strength were gone. A noble freedom certainly is this in which the arm that holds you up is really held up by you, in which, while others think they are supporting you, you really are supporting them, and this noble freedom may come to any weak and wounded life whose wounds and weakness have become the signs and tokens that it belongs to Christ.—The Rev. Phillips Brooks.

The seperation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union into two camps on the question of woman suffrage is, says the New York Methodist, an event of considerable importance. We are not especially concerned with the details of it. Whether or not a new departure was taken by the suffragist majority at the last meeting is of no large importance; what is certain is that the anti-suffragists then discovered that they were the minority and must remain in that character or go out. The "do everything policy" which the Union has honestly pursued to promote temperance reform could not include so spechul and combative an item as woman suffrage. It is a question that admits no compromise; to be in the Union was to be for such suffrage in favorable localities and to be against it in unfavorable localities—or to be in favor of it where there should be some hope of getting it. In short, the W. C. T. U. is laboring to promote woman suffrage. The division which has recently occured will give it greater liberty in that direction, and suffrage may become its chief business. We believe that all women suffragists are temperance advocates, and the temperance reform makes a good base for an advance. But Christian women who are unalterably opposed to woman suffrage—who believe that such suffrage involves greater dangers to our family life than Mormonism and unlimited divorce—cannot possibly compromise on this question. They do not wish to fight one stubborn evil by bringing in another which, in their judgment, involves vastly greater dangers. It will be well if, hereafter, the suffragists and anti-suffragists keep to seperate camps; and the old W. C. T. U. will be most successful as a womans suffrage organization. The new society will doubtless have the hearty co-operation of all anti-suffragist Christian women.

INGERSOLL AND THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

"That majestic stream, supplied from a thousand unfailing fountains, rolls on, and will roll forever."—Judge Black.

A straw, floating down on the river's tide
Got caught in an eddy along its side,
And, whirling about in a giddy dream,
'Twas borne for a distance up the stream.
And scathing it cried: "What a wondrous force
See how I have changed the river's course!"
But there came a rise with the summer rain
And the eddy swept into the current again;
But the straw was as high and dry on the shore,
And the river flowed on the same as before.

MY SHEPHERD.

"He leadeth me!"
And so I need not seek my own rough way
Across the desert wild;
He knoweth where the soft green pastures lie,
Where the still waters glide,
And how to reach the coolness of their rest
Beneath the calm hillside.

"He leadeth me!"
And though it be by rugged, weary ways,
Where thorns spring sharp and sore,
No pathway can seem strange or desolate
Where Jesus "goes before."
His gentle shepherding my solace is,
And gladness yet in store.

"He leadeth me!"
I shall not take one needless step through all,
In wind or heat or cold;
And all day long he sees the peaceful end
Through trials manifold.
Up the fair hillside, like some sweet surprise,
Waiteth the quiet fold.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1882.—MARK VII. 1-23.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."—Mark vii. 7.

THE TRADITIONS OF MEN.

This chapter begins the last year of our Lord's ministry. It was a year of bitter opposition and persistent persecution, opening with this covert attack of the scribes and Pharisees. The verses sum up the great controversy which prevailed during the ministry of the New Testament, that between the religion of the letter and external observances, and the religion of the heart. The principle of organization of those leading this controversy was the same as that which exists to-day in all such disputes, namely, determined opposition and hatred to Christ and his pure teachings. These scribes and Pharisees came down from Jerusalem as delegated representatives of the Sanhedrim. Their purpose was to watch and counteract, in every way they were able, the wide-spreading influence of this great Teacher, who was attracting to himself many of the people by performing such charming miracles as feeding five thousand people at one meal, healing their sick, and even raising their dead to life. It was, indeed, time for the church authorities to do something. It did not take these detectives long, with their sharp-eyed prejudices, to find something to censure. The first case brings to view the constant and intrusive surveillance to which our Lord and his followers were subjected. They saw some of his disciples eating with defiled hands; that is to say, they ate their meal without going through a ceremonial cleansing beforehand. The hollow-hearted traditionists found in this a grievous fault. The number of washings, and the thoroughness of the scrubbing, were their guage of purity. This was not inculcated in the law, but the teaching of their traditions, which they compared to rich wine, which was not improved by adding too much water, which to them was the symbol of the word of the Scriptures.

A strict traditionist, shut up in prison, with only bread and water enough to sustain life, would have rather perished from thirst than eat with unwashen hands. The law of Moses required the purification of all the vessels of worship, and in certain cases the worshiper himself, teaching the lesson that no man without holiness could approach God, but these rabbis perverted the spirit of Leviticus just as they did every other ordinance, by applying it to many trivial things, until the lesson of purity was lost altogether. These hypocrites, with well-sembled sincerity, asked the Master why this irregularity in his disciples. They framed the question for the ecclesiasticism of all ages, which makes tradition and the teaching of the fathers the standard of religious life rather than the word of God. This same complaint of want of conformity to the church is still heard, a masked accusation of lack of piety. The Master always had ready an answer for such disingenuous questioners. He knew their lives, and saw the defilement of their innermost. His reply left them no ground to stand upon. Well did the prophet Isaiah foresee your spirit when he said this people honoreth me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; those attempts at worship are vain, the commandments of God are laid aside that they may hold on to the traditions. At the bottom of all this vigorous enforcement of traditional observances there is an unconscious, half-conscious, repugnance to submit to the perfect will of God. It was not merely a multiplication and dilution of precepts in regard to purification, but in others of far more importance, not mere rites, but moral duties, not only the abuse of temporary and positive institutions, but also the subverting of the most tender natural relations. He gives one instance of the effect of this species of Pharisaic superstition—a most affecting one—which tells volumes as to the tendency and spirit of this wickedness. Their tradition had about neutralized and perverted one of the commands of God, which was at the very base of all social and family government. Honor thy father and thy mother. This commandment, by a counter tradition, they had all but obliterated. A son might, with the utterance of one word, and that word a falsehood, free himself from all obligation to help his parents—a sort of self-emancipation, a turning over to the Lord all of his property and all of his time and strength, a sort of dishonest bankruptcy, making the Lord his assignee, and the whole transaction a fraud, to escape the obligation and debt of love a child owes to his parents. And ye permit him to do no more for his parents? Your traditions teach you to countenance such villany. Can the human imagination conceive of a more monstrous wickedness done in the name of religion? Corban; the utterance of the word was enough to silence every traditionist; the idea so exquisite in its wickedness is a fine illustration of man's attempt of improving upon the law of God. This was enough for the scribes and Pharisees, so he turns from them and addresses himself to the multitude, who by this time were prepared to drink in every word he might say, and with admirable plainness, strength and brevity he lays down the principles of real polution. He turns, with seeming relief, from the disputes and fallacies of schools to the unperverted consciences of the common people. He calls them unto him. Hearken every one of you, and understand; there is nothing from without a man that, entering into him, can defile him; but the things that come out of him, those are they that defile the man. The extreme anti-tobacconists might well heed this lesson with as much profit as the users of the plant. The underlying truth is that nothing external to character can defile the soul so long as it remains external and does not become incorporated in the character. From the way Christ called attention to their ears he must have seen that some were not making good use of theirs, as the sequel shows by Peter's question as soon as they came into a house apart from the multitude. The disciples wanted his parable explained. Peter was very particular what he ate, as to whether it was clean or unclean. The Master reproves them: Are ye so without understanding also? Then he told them plainly: Out of the heart proceedeth all these evil things; the whole inner man the character. He lays his hand on the traitor. He points out the spring of all moral impurity; it originates in the heart of man's being, and thence wells out. He came to give us a new heart, to cleanse this fountain-head, and thus purify all the streams of our life.

Good Samaritanism.

No one who is an attentive observer of passing events can have failed to notice that there has been, during the last four years, in all the Christian churches, a remarkable development of "the grace of liberality." Scarcely a week passes that the telegraph wires do not flash across the continents the tidings of benevolence on a princely scale. The periodical literature of Christendom teems with accounts of donations, vastly varied in amount, for educational, ecclesiastical and other benevolent purposes. But all these manifestations of good Samaritanism, accounts of which ride on the lightning's wings and give employment to compositors and proof-readers, are but an infinitesimal part of the deeds of love of which the world hears not. Almost every neighborhood, especially in the cities, has its good Samaritan, whose deeds of benevolence, although little known on earth, are treasured up on high by him who has promised to reward even the gift of "a cup of cold water."

Our beloved ADVOCATE has recently brought to light numerous outcroppings of this substratum of Christian benevolence. No lover of "the true, the beautiful and the good" can have failed to read with a glow of delight the letter recently published in the ADVOCATE from a lady living in Madison county, Miss., in which she shows that to her this has not been "a cold-hearted world." And that good brother of Jackson, La., whose obituary was recently published by Dr. Andrews, how inspiring and stimulating is his example. Other similar instances, which the ADVOCATE has brought to light, will occur to those who are attentive readers. These things show that this world has more of true benevolence in it than it gets credit for. The seeds of gospel truth have not rotted in the soil. The parable of the good Samaritan has done its work. The example of self-sacrifice set by the lowly Nazarene has leavened a huge lump of modern humanity. Deep down in the heart of the nineteenth century church there is a spirit of noble generosity, which "feels another's woe," and runs to his relief. Believing this as firmly as I believe the gospel itself, I have written these lines, hoping they may greet the eye of some of this class, for I am not writing now for the worshipers of mammon. Those professing Christians whose God is gold may as well skip the remainder of this article, for it will be dry reading to them.

For the good Samaritans who may be found here and there I have a word. I wish to tell them of an opportunity of doing good. A Methodist preacher is in distress—a noble, faithful, devoted servant of the church—a man who has filled important positions and rendered efficient service. His health is gone, his physical organism apparently a complete wreck. With a large family to be reared, he is entirely without resources. The pittance which he may receive after a time from the Conference fund is a mere bagatelle to a family like his, and even this sum is not available for his present necessities. It does seem to me that if anything can touch the heart and open the pocket of a Christian it is a case like this. Who will respond? Every one will naturally desire to know who the distressed one is. His name I am not at liberty to give in this public way; but if any one feels desirous of contributing to his relief let him so inform me, and the name will be given. Some of our preachers might take the matter in hand, and raise a few dollars in sums so small that no one would miss his contribution. Brother itinerant, how soon you may be in this brother's condition who can tell! If any of our Bishops know of some brother who has the means and the inclination to practice good Samaritanism I will take great pleasure in giving them the name of this worthy brother. We in Natchez expect to contribute our mite. Brethren, remember the words of the Master in the conclusion of the parable of the good Samaritan: "Go thou and do likewise."

"Bearing the Infirmities of the Weak."

It is generally conceded that all real Christians are true in spirit even if their creeds contain much error, but it can not be denied that some Christians possess more strength than others. It is a fact that two Christians, equal in intellect and education, differ in religious stamina—one is stronger and more reliable than the other. This depends largely, it may be, upon their early training, and the opportunities they have had for the development of religious strength. Some Christians of limited education, according to the common acceptation of the term, have broad views of religion, and exercise themselves accordingly. The two faithful servants in the "parable of the pounds" had the same amount of means to operate with, yet one gained twice as much as the other, but both secured the approval of the nobleman to whom they were subject. This evidently shows that one was the stronger, and that both were faithful. It is not an easy matter for any one to rise, religiously, above the "examples that he has had continually set before him." No matter how earnest he may be, if he be under the direct influence of bad examples his progress in spiritual things will evidently be slow. It has been said that men are like water which is ever seeking its level. That is true, but it will not find it if it be hindered from an opportunity to do so. So it is with men. There are different grades of Christians in the church. There are the strong, the stronger and the strongest, and there are the weak, the weaker and the weakest. The apostle teaches that one part of the duty of the strong is to bear the infirmities of the weak. "They that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." To do so is Christ-like. Such persons were the most attractive to him. He acted upon the principle that the sickest one needs the physician the most. Those that are weak should be lifted up, that there may be an increase of strength upon their part. It is expected that those who are strong should do strong work; it can not be expected of the weak. The church acts wisely when it chooses the strongest members for the most important and responsible positions. This doubtless is done in the most of cases. As the church, however, is fallible, mistakes are sometimes made in this matter, and the result is not good. This rule should be observed in the ministry as well as among lay members. Put a preacher of narrow mental capacity, that has but little experience spiritually, into a hard charge, and there will be a backward movement. Some are beginning to think that there are getting to be certain charges in our church that are held in reserve as places of nourishment for the weak and so-called inefficient preachers. There is no doubt, if the Lord directs in the appointments, but that the strongest preachers are put in charge of the hardest works. If the weakest preachers were to be sent to the hardest appointments reason teaches us that there can be no advancement. So far as the feeling of a preacher about his appointment is concerned, if he is strictly loyal, he does not desire an appointment that he believes to be above himself, neither does he desire one that he thinks is below him, but he wishes one that is suitable, one in which he can accomplish the most good. If a preacher has a charge that is above him, he is as much afflicted as he would be in one that is below him. A man can be just as vain in underrating himself as he can in overrating himself.

One of the principal burdens of the pastor is the administration of Discipline, and his success in this matter depends mainly upon the strength of his own character. He may preach well, and be popular also, and not succeed well as a pastor. It is not possible for a preacher to elevate the people that he serves above himself. It is not uncommon for one preacher to build up a work, and his successor lets it go down. This is because he is not sufficiently strong, as a matter of course. A teacher should stand above his scholars so far as education is concerned; so ought a preacher, if possible, to stand above the people that wait on his ministry in intellect, education and religion, the majority of them at least. Then he can instruct the ignorant as they ought to be, and he can lift up the feeble, and be qualified to appreciate the condition of every one. If religious workers are not guarded they will give most attention to those that need it the least—the strong—and neglect the weak. It is weakness not to be doing good.

Colportage Sketches—No. 23.

BY A. M. JONES.

"I BELIEVE YOU DONATE BIBLES SOMETIMES."

While spending the day at a small railroad town a kindly-disposed gentleman suggested Mr. ——'s store as a convenient and suitable place for opening and exhibiting my Bibles. The introduction of such cheap books having created an excitement, a crowd soon gathered to examine and satisfy their curiosity. Being quiet, intelligent people, and learning, beyond a doubt, that the books were genuine Bibles, and the prices remarkably low, they, with the exception of one, immediately supplied themselves and retired. This one was a gentleman of fine, rather imposing personal appearance, tall and straight, near thirty-five years of age, and handsomely dressed. During the most interesting part of the occasion, while in the very midst of the excitement arising from the announcement of a Bible for twenty-five cents, and a Testament for a nickel, this gentleman entered in haste, as if eager to know what was to pay. And, though I was exceedingly busy selecting suitable copies for various parties, answering reasonable questions, changing money, and making entries in my memorandum, yet, as if especially commissioned spokesman for the town, he at once, and in a very learned, knowing way, began a tirade of interrogations, which continued in rapid succession, one after another, for at least thirty minutes. His appearance indicating a man of importance, and his first questions only natural, and therefore not objectionable, I for some time let others wait, and gave my attention to him. On discovering that he was more anxious to talk than to buy a Bible I quietly turned away, supplied his neighbors, and answered his questions, which had now become monotonous in the most condensed manner possible. An occasional question is not out of place, but a continuation of inquiries from the same source will finally exhaust the patience of the most gentle. When the others were all gone this gentleman, having at last exhausted his vocabulary of questions, was still on hand, holding up in my presence a small, elegantly bound copy, worth $1 25, and in the most extravagant language eulogizing the American Bible Society. In a loud tone of voice he continued: "It deserves the praise and patronage of all good men. It has done more to circulate the Holy Scriptures than any other institution in the world." Not more, I suppose, than the London Bible Society. "Yes, sir, it has done more than all others together." The last sentence was spoken to me only, as even the merchant, for some purpose, had stepped out on the street. Turning the leaves, as if examining it more minutely, he said: "I need just such a Bible as this." Then walking to the door and looking out, evidently to ascertain whether or not we were alone, he returned, and softly said: "I believe you donate Bibles sometimes." The modest insinuation was plain, and I deliberately surveyed him from head to foot. While noting his well-polished boots, faultless black suit, gold watch-chain and beaver hat I could not surpress an emotion of mingled mischief and contempt. Yes, I "donate" a great many of these books. The seeking of the poor and the destitute, and gratuitously supplying them with the Holy Scriptures, is, in the estimation of the American Bible Society, the most important feature of my mission. It is, true, I sell hundreds, even thousands, but in many cases much prefer giving them away. At this I referred to my memorandum, and called his attention to the number disposed of in that way during the month, and especially to a few having been placed in the hands of the poor that morning. To all this he was very attentive, and for the first time since entering the room became silent. He had asked questions, offered advice, praised the Bible Society and complimented the colporteur. For such services, so kindly rendered, the Bible was undoubtedly expected as a present. I had never seen nor heard of this gentleman before. Did not so much as know his name, but, feeling that such meanness deserved rebuke, looked him full in the face, and said: While it always affords me pleasure to give Bibles to the poor, yet that book will cost you $1 25. Will you take it? The effect is better imagined than described. After coloring deeply, and a moment's hesitation, he handed me the money, and quickly left the store. On another occasion he was at church, where a collection was raised for the Bible cause, but declined a contribution. All money controlled by the American Bible Society has been given by some benevolent persons for a specific purpose, therefore those able to buy Bibles should never expect them as a gratuity, instead of wanting the book as a gift my friend should have paid for it at once, and then made a liberal contribution to the cause. Such would have been so nice.

From Lampasas, Texas.

MR. EDITOR: I am under many obligations to you and your enterprising publisher for the Sunday-School Lessons, printed early enough to give us the benefit of them. Thousands of hearts will thank you for this timely publication. The far away must be thought of. They are our brothers and friends in the gospel of Christ, our blessed Saviour. Do unto others as we would have them do unto us.

I have received twenty-seven additions to my churches since Conference. Others will join soon. I have an important work before me, possibly the most attractive place in all Texas is the Lampasas "Sulphur Springs."

The Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railway Company have bought the Springs, and will build a $100,000 hotel here soon. We have, by said railway connection, direct communication with Galveston. Many business men are coming here from St. Louis, Atlanta, and other cities and States. You can take the boat at New Orleans and go to Galveston, or take the railroad and go to Houston, and then take the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe railroad, and come direct to our city of beauty and health.

I have one suggestion to offer. Make some arrangements at the General Conference about the salary of presiding eldors. Our present system is a poor one. The district stewards rarely ever meet, and, as a consequence, there is a bad feeling in the Quarterly Conference about informal assessments for the presiding elder. Both preacher in charge and presiding elder are hurt. Both are poorly paid, because many members are not willing to support the presiding elder, and especially when he forces his claims irregularly upon the Quarterly Conference. Would suggest as a remedy a per cent. of the salary of preacher in charge for the presiding elder, say fifteen per cent. would be a good allowance.

Take a church that pays $1,000; presiding elder to receive $150. Ten such charges would pay him $1,500. Presiding elders can live on $1,000 more easily than a station preacher can on $1,000. The office of presiding elder, as now managed, is a burden to the progress of our church. It must be modified some way. Many places the presiding elder is not wanted at all. Stewards complain of this burden in collecting the preacher's salary.

Yours truly, W. H. LEFEVRE.

Franklinton Circuit, Mississippi Conference.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say through the ADVOCATE, to you and my friends, that after an absence of two months from my pastoral charge, caused by a visit to my home at Ocean Springs, Miss., and an attack of varioloid, contracted in traveling in the discharge of the duties of my ministry, that through the mercy of the great Head of the church, and the attention of kind friends, who, through Rev. R. B. Downer, came to our relief, and who dared not personally approach us, notwithstanding their desire to do so in our day of suffering, and that we could not expect them to do so, but would express to each our heartfelt thanks for their prayers, sympathy and material aid, and we thank God that through prudence of all parties that it did not spread, that only a few persons in Covington, La., and myself at Ocean Springs, were affected, and all are now in good health.

As to my own health, I would state simply that I drove over the roughest roads in Mississippi (besides crossing streams much swollen), an average of thirty miles per day, for five consecutive days, one hundred and fifty miles; arrived on the first instant, preached on Sabbath at eleven A. M. and seven P. M., and have good health.

Our friends here, so soon as they heard of our affliction at Ocean Springs, sent money to us, and now receive us back, and are making arrangements for our comfort.

We have a very pleasant, comfortable parsonage. The church seems to be living in peace and morality, and are praying and looking for a revival of religion. All things of persons affected with the disease, both at Covington and Ocean Springs, have been thoroughly disinfected, cleaned, fumigated or burned, and there is not in these communities any sign of small-pox.

I thank God that I am permitted, with renewed strength and improved voice, to enter again into the work to which the Master called me, in 1840, in this, Franklinton, circuit, and should he cause me to end my labor here, where I began, I am content. O, that I may be ready!

Yours in Christ,

JOSEPH NICHOLSON.

Obituaries.

HAUSER—Mrs. JACOB HAUSER was born, in Stokes county, N. C., September 28, 1803, and died, near Montevallo, Ala., February 23, 1882. Of his childhood and boyhood we know but little, except that he was reared among the Moravians. But it matters not what religious sect influenced him in his youth; his latter life leaves the impression that he was directed providentially. He became acquainted with the Methodists in early life, and liked them best. And in the year 1824 he found peace with God through faith in the blood of Christ, and connected himself with the Methodist Church, of which he was a consistent, devoted member, to his death. The same year of his conversion he was married to Miss Sarah McBride, of Surry county, N. C., who preceded him a number of years to the reward of the faithful.

He moved to Shelby county, Ala., in 1836, and, unlike many, he brought his membership with him, and lived to his death in Shelby and the western part of Bibb counties. As a citizen and neighbor he observed the golden rule; those nearest him loved him most. As a husband, Bro. Hauser was as Paul admonished: loving and benevolent, always true to his trust. As a father he was tender, kind, gentle, devoted and considerate; ever ruling with authority, yet, with love and kindness, leading his children in the "Lamb of God,"—raising them "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." His children's own language is: "We can testify to his godly walk and conversation,' and feel that we shall "rise up and call him blessed." We have no doubt our father being in heaven already joined with the heavenly hosts in the anthem: 'Glory to the Lamb which was slain to give power, wisdom, honor and glory forever.'"

As a Methodist he was true to his vows, and would never condescend to indulge in fashionable currents; "shunning every appearance of evil," "renouncing the devil and all his work," and the vain pomp and glory of the world. As a Christian he was a model; his light shone to all the world around him. He was class leader for a number of years, and held his meetings as long as he was able and could get a congregation. He much regretted the day that class meetings were left optional, because he thought they were the life of religion in the church. He was also steward for many years, and with delight would pay to and collect for the pastor. Methodist preachers had a warm place in his heart, and a comfortable room in his home. He never, unless providentially hindered, neglected family worship; thus leading his family in the path of righteousness. His seat was seldom vacant at the house of worship while in health. He suffered a great deal from affliction the last two or three years of his life. I recollect the first time the writer visited him as pastor, about twelve months ago, in company with W. H. McDaniel, we thought he was at the point of death. Uncle McDaniel asked him if his religion gave him comfort in his affliction. He replied: "It is all the comfort I have. If it were not for my religion I could not stand it." And we knelt and prayed by his bedside, and he responded with many "amens." He recovered from the attack, and was able to go to church a few times, though not well. While there he would pray with great mellowness in heart and tones for the church and people.

In his fatal illness he took his bed only a few days before his death. He was then fully ripe for eternity. During this last illness he would constantly quote such passages of Scripture as related to the Christian's triumphant state. And when he saw his daughters weeping around his bed he said: "Weep not for me; trust in the Lord, he will provide." Such was his last advice to his loving Christian daughters. His death was so triumphant that he began to shout the triumphant song before he departed. The last words distinguished were in praise—praise to the Lamb. Bro. Hauser leaves seven daughters to mourn the loss of a father. "We mourn not as those who have no hope."

HARVEY—JESSE HARVEY, son of Rev. John Harvey, was born in Davidson county, Tenn., June [illegible], and died in Sharon, Miss., October [illegible], being upward of eighty-five years of age.

He professed religion, when a young man, under the preaching of Rev. Sterling Brown, in this county, Tenn., and ever afterward remained a consistent, faithful believer in the gospel of the Son of God.

In August, 1826, he was married, in Lincoln county, Ala., to Miss Harriet V. Strange, who, in patient hope, still waits the summons to join him in the promised home in heaven. They raised eight children, one of whom fell in the defense of his native south during the late civil war. In 1861 they kept the Steward's Hall in Lagrange, Ala. In 1865 they lived in Washington, Miss., whence he removed, at the close of the year, to Sharon, in the same State, that his children might enjoy the superior educational advantages which, for more than a quarter of a century, that place afforded for females and females. Here he lived to the day of his death.

He was by employment a brick layer, yet maintained a fondness for literature. Few, if any, spoke, ever laid brick more smoothly or poetry more fluently than he. He carried in his mind a copious variety of the choicest poetic verses. It was surprising and pleasant to hear him mingle the music of the trowel and the rhythmic numbers of the best classic poets. His naturally cheerful disposition appeared to be sweetened by Divine grace. He seemed never to be out of humor, and was especially attractive to children. As a kind and faithful husband and father at home he was peculiarly [illegible] abroad. If he had secret faults he knew it not. Come when and as it may, death is terrible to man. A blind intruder into the domain of life, a relentless violator of the strongest ties of our nature, he comes to robe us of what we have been startled at the most of life. We can but die in the struggle to resist him, when, as in the case of Bro. Harvey, he slowly almost imperceptibly suspends our powers of life, veils the mind and steals the strength, separating us from the world, though not leaving us aught but the hope of heaven. He came, if ever, that he is shorn of his terror and we go reluctantly with him. So sank this brother to rest and he sleeps in the hope of resurrection unto life.

W. L.

VAUGHN—MRS. AEY JANE VAUGHN was born the twenty-sixth day of January, A. D. [illegible], in Pike county, Miss., and died, near the place of her birth, the fifth day of March, A. D. 1882, after a protracted affliction with what her physician called dry gangrene, with which she was afflicted. But she had the support of Divine grace which enabled her to bear the intense suffering with resignation. Sister Vaughn embraced religion, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church while young, and lived a consistent member up to the day of her death.

She had been married four times, and the children—four daughters and one son. Two of the daughters have died, each leaving a family of three, two daughters and the son still living. The children all became religious while young and joined the church.

Sister Vaughn's life has been one of many trials, these trials no doubt have been useful, under the blessing of God, in preparing her for a home in heaven. The writer was with her a great deal of the time during her last affliction and talked with her freely about dying, and she invariably expressed herself as being ready to die at any moment.

Beside the intense suffering from her disease she was deprived of her eyesight a few days after she was taken sick, and remained totally blind till death came to her relief. She was an affectionate mother, a kind neighbor, and a consistent Christian. She had been a widow for many years; had raised her own children, and saw them all with families of their own. When she was taken sick she had charge of a family of grandchildren left by one of her daughters. Frequently during her affliction her mind would be drawn out for the salvation of her children and friends, commending them to the mercy and grace of God.

She died without a struggle or a groan, and has no doubt entered into a rest that is sweet to her weary mind and body, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are forever at rest.

MILLSAPS—WALTER CHALMERS MILLSAPS, son of H. G. and Valencia Millsaps, was born June [illegible], and died February 15, 1882, aged nearly five years. He was indeed a sprightly little boy. Three years ago he was dedicated to the Lord in baptism. The day before taking sick he began school, and, though quite young, his little mind seemed ready to receive the instruction given.

While pure through the death of Christ, and before he knew sorrow for sin, he went home to live with God and the angels. Amid all the difficulties of the family father and mother be mindful of the fact that "Walter" is there "waiting and watching" them.

AT LAST.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And in the winds from unmanned spaces blown,
I hear the voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown.

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting—
Earth, sky, home pictures, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but thee, O Father! Let thy spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold;
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm, I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place.

Enough that there the door of thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows forever through heaven's green expansions
The river of thy peace.

There, from the music round me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find, at last, beneath thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

Notes of Life.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

THE JERKS.

It was about this year—1819—the phenomenon called the Jerks disappeared. During twenty years it had occurred, principally in the Western country, especially in Kentucky and Tennessee. It sprang up in the midst of the "great awakening," about the beginning of the century, and for the first decade spread and prevailed wonderfully. It was marked by sudden and often very violent spasms, affecting, like a paralysis, the whole body, but confined more frequently to the arms, head, and upper portion of the body. Many fell, seemingly lifeless, and would lay silent and insensible a long time, not flinching from pain when experiments were made. So violent were the motions of others that it was necessary to restrain them forcibly from injuring themselves. At the early period, which marked the origin of the movement resulting in the organization of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, these exercises, as they were called, were various and extravagant to a surprising degree. They were not confined to any particular Church, nor, indeed, to any classes of citizens—saint and sinner, grave old ministers and careless worldlings were attacked. I have been reliably informed that at a famous great union-meeting, held on the border of Kentucky and Tennessee, so intense and general was the exercise, that, among other wild and strange scenes, was a race at night between a noted preacher and one of his elders. The preacher could no longer suppress his feelings, and started hastily to leave the encampment, lest he might be overtaken by the Jerks, and publicly expose himself. His elder followed to take care of him. Adown the road they went—both did their best, but the elder grabbed him after a half-mile chase, and just as he had begun to climb a tree. At the foot of the tree they shouted awhile, embraced each other, and wept tears of holy joy together. Calmly and quietly, an hour, later, they returned, better prepared to instruct and soothe others. I have seen a dozen at the same time who needed to be controlled. Usually we would stop preaching when the Jerks began, and sing, or talk kindly and softly to them. Those who came to make sport of it were often its subjects. I have seen many fall from their seats in church as if struck by electricity. The less cultured were most subject to it. Of course there were many exceptions. Preachers in my time very rarely suffered. Do you ask what we thought and did about them when they happened in our meetings—the cause and moral effect? In reply, we must say, we were always sorry to see them, but did not feel it right to oppose it directly and indiscriminately, lest, perchance, we might "fight against God." Those who were affected by them appeared mortified—they seemed to try to suppress their emotions until they could do so no longer. If such could find relief in singing, weeping, or shouting, the struggle ended. I believe they were, by a great majority, sincere and good people, although usually of an excitable temperament; yet some of the gentlest and best Christians were occasionally of the number. We do not comprehend the action and reaction of soul and body, much less of God's Spirit upon the human soul and body. That both good and evil may have attended them, I doubt not. Irreligious spectators were often deeply impressed, and dated their subsequent conversion to these strange scenes. They could not account for them without reference to supernatural power. Others were offended, hardened, and hindered. Having never been very demonstrative in my religious feelings—perhaps never sufficiently so—I tried to rely for usefulness upon the faithful use of the divinely-instituted means, and commit results to God in faith and prayer. Revivals are most here, or the church becomes a spiritual cemetery; but for its extensive and permanent welfare its pastors must be teachers and master-builders. These duties require wisdom, patience, and earnest devotion. Spasmodic and sensational efforts are not enough. It matters not what God may do, or allow to be done, to startle and awaken the slumbering soul, if its energies are thenceforth rightfully directed. Nothing is more dangerous than indifference, especially when caused by a vicious habit; then the force of a moral earthquake is needed. The giants who figured in the "great awakening," belonging to various churches, have disappeared, and the protracted excitement has passed over like a storm-cloud. We hear only the reverberation of the distant thunder, and it is to be feared that the calm which has succeeded is lulling to repose the church and her watchmen. I prefer a storm occasionally to perpetual stupor.

Mormon Missions and their Results.

The story is a stirring one and the fruits are remarkable. This famous, infamous church was organized April 6, 1830, and, as one of its most learned apostles alleges, "just 1800 years to-day from the resurrection of Jesus." Six men composed it and they set forth at once to convert the whole world. The Book of Mormon relates in part to the Lamanites, ancestors of our aborigines, and so, with great propriety and within a few months, some elders were sent to the American Indians. Next year 30 elders started westward from Kirtland, Ohio, preaching as they journeyed till Missouri was reached. The year following the St. Lawrence was crossed and among others Brigham Young preached and baptized in Canada, and throughout New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio the gospel of the latter day was sounded out. Early in 1835 the twelve apostles were chosen and went forth at once to call all peoples and kindreds to repentance and faith, and also a quorum of seventies was ordained for the same work. These traversed the whole region from the Atlantic to the Alleghenies and made a tremendous stir. Two years after, during the fiery trials which befell the prophet and the saints in Missouri, two of the apostles Heber C. Kimball and Orson Hyde, with several elders, crossed the ocean, and destitute and friendless, set foot in England. Liverpool was their landing-place, but they pushed out at once thirty miles, to Preston, in Herefordshire. Great numbers gave heed to their doctrine, and by immersion were sealed saints. When called home, they had a most thrilling story to tell.

In 1840 the twelve were sent out to reinforce the British Mission, and landed at Liverpool, April 6, just ten years from the organization of the church. They entered all the chief cities in the face of furious opposition, and penetrated to Scotland and Wales. But the great harvest was gathered in Herefordshire, where whole villages and churches of United Brethren, with their pastors, went over in a body to Mormonism. Apostle Woodruff, baptized 160 in thirty days, 48 of the number being preachers. At the end of twelve months three Conferences had been formed, with some 7,000 members. In June of this year the first company of 31, sailed for America, and before it closed 1,000 more had followed.

In 1841, "by revelation," Elders Hyde and Page took their journey to Palestine; but found no room for Joseph. On Zion and Olivet they set up a heap of stones, and "with pen, ink, and paper" offered for the Holy Land a consecrating prayer. In 1843 emissaries of Smith penetrated to the Islands of the South Pacific. The year after the career of the prophet was closed by the hands of a mob; but not until he could number near 100,000 adherents and 20,000 of them in Nauvoo. During the disasters which followed most of the elders were called home, and it was not till after the saints were seated in Salt Lake that missionary work was recommenced. In 1847 "these valleys of the mountains" were possessed, and the year following, to Orson Pratt was appointed the presidency of the British mission. Then followed the glorious era for mission work in that land. Astonishing progress was made for four years, or until polygamy was proclaimed, in 1853. At that date 30,000 church-members were reckoned; but so great was the shock and the scandal that many apostatized, and some 1,800 were excommunicated for refusing to receive the doctrine. What was then lost has never since been regained.

In 1850 the elders of "Israel" entered France, Germany, the Scandinavian countrys, Italy, Switzerland, and the Sandwich Islands, and the Book of Mormon was translated into five languages. In 1852 the elders made their advent into the West Indies, British Guiana, Gibralter, Malta, South Africa, Ceylon, Hindustan, Siam, China, and Australia. In most of these countries they received little for their pains and soon retired. In 1853-4 Prussia and Austria received and with governmental violence rejected the messengers of Brigham Young. Since that date few fields have been occupied and mission-work is mainly confined to four or five regions.

During the last five years from Utah have been sent something over 800 elders, or at the average rate of about 160 a year. In 1880, the semi-centennial of the Mormon Church, the number rose to 226. Last year it was 183, and besides 70 were sent to Arizona; but for the most part not to preach, but to colonize. Of these 800 more than one-third (284) were assigned to the United States, 111 to the South; one-fourth (219) to Great Britian; to Scandinavia 114, to the Sandwich Islands 17, and to New Zealand 13. In 1880, 87 were sent to the British Isles, 33 to Scandinavian countries, 48 to the South, and 33 to the North; and last year, to Holland 1, to Germany 3, to Sandwich Islands, 6, to New Zealand 9, to the Southern States 56, to the Northern States 33, to Norway, Sweden, Denmark 35, and to England, Scotland, and Wales 89, or in all 189. Taking the average duration of an elder's term as two years, we have a total of about 400 Mormon missionaries abroad at any given date.

As to the number that "gather" year by year, or the total of conversions from the beginning, in 1830, the facts are not easy to get. In 1849 was organized the Perpetual Emigration Fund, whose design was and is to help poor saints to reach the sacred soil of Utah, by paying a part or the whole of their emigrating expenses, and taking a note for the same, with interest at 10 per cent. From this fund some $60,000 a year are expended. In those days the usual route was via New Orleans and the Missouri to Council Bluffs, thence across the plains. In 1851 about 3,000 were "gathered." In 1856 came the climax of emigration, and then it was that the fatal hand-cart scheme was by "revelation" devised. From 1840—54, or in 15 years, 21,911 crossed the sea and the mountains. Between 1849, and 1860, 28,740 had entered the Land of Promise. Within the next decade some 25,000 more took ship from Europe to Salt Lake, and not far from the same number between 1870 and 1882, or in all, from the first ship-load, in 1840, say about 85,000. The annual increase from emigrants is not far from 2,000.—N. Y. Independent.

MISSIONARY.

—The American Board was compelled to make some reductions in its expenditures last fall, and those reductions chiefly affected the native agency. We are glad to be assured by an article in the Missionary Herald that the result has not been altogether harmful. The people, it appears, are struggling along, doing their best, giving generously out of their poverty, and developing, it may be hoped, a spirit of self-reliance. In Turkey there is a combination of circumstances against the native churches, and they have not taken as long a stride toward self-support as it was hoped they might; but it has been simply impossible to raise large sums. Reports from all parts of Turkey are to the effect that the income of members has fallen off, in some cases ninety per cent., and many are even looking to the pastor for help to get their daily bread. Yet they are asked to give and do give liberally. In India the union of native churches in the Maratha mission has taken steps, in the face of only partial recovery from a disastrous famine, which, it is hoped, will lead soon to the self-support of these churches in this field. In the Madura mission, where the members earn about ten cents a day, everybody gives something, even those whose yearly income is only six dollars. In many villages the contributions of the previous year have been doubled.—New York Independent.

—The Jin-riki sha, or man-power cart of Japan, owes its existence to Mr. Goble, who was formerly a Baptist missionary attached to the American Society. In Tokio alone there are between forty and fifty thousand, giving employment to a similar number of men; and the tax upon them brings into the government treasury, from Tokio alone, a revenue of over $75,000 annually. They weigh about one hundred pounds each; yet one of these cart-men can keep pace with a horse and carriage going at an ordinary rate. These conveyances are being introduced into India, and will be found cheaper than an ordinary carriage, and more pleasant than a palanquin. Zenana missionary ladies may find them convenient in the narrow lanes which they have to visit.

AFRICA.—Of the death of Rev. J. S. Payne, of the Liberia mission, his son writes: "The scene was most touching. He said that he was about to enter the kingdom of his Lord, and that all was peace to him. Among his last words were, "This religion of ours is no myth. All is well. Glory be to God for Jesus Christ!" Mr. Payne was a highly-valued member of our mission, having been connected with it for over forty years. He has been president of the Republic, was delegate to the General Conference of 1880, and presided at the Liberia Conference of 1881. His departure will be a serious loss to our mission in Africa, where his counsels are greatly needed. Mission rooms, Methodist Episcopal Church.

—The Livingstone Inland mission was established, three years ago with a view to evangelizing, by means of industrial mission stations, the valley of the Congo, West Central Africa. It has now a chain of stations, extending 225 miles up the course of the river, the highest being at Manyanga, 135 miles below Stanley Pool, and a working force of twenty. The death of the leader, Mr. Adam McCall, occurred recently. His body was embalmed and conveyed by steamer to Liverpool, whence it was conveyed to Leicester, and interred in the cemetery in presence of the mayor of the city and a large concourse of spectators. Among the mourners were two colored youths from the river Congo.

—It is seven years since the Free Church of Scotland set about establishing the Livingstonia mission settlement on the southern shore of Lake Nyassa (South Central Africa) as a memorial of Dr. Livingstone. Not only has the Gospel been preached to the natives on the shores of the lake, but an effectual check has been put on the slave trade. Formerly, as many as 10,000 slaves were annually carried off from this region. Late last fall intelligence were received of the baptism of the first convert at this mission. About one hundred and twenty children are attending the schools.

—Prof. A. Rauschenbusch, in a lecture in the German Baptist Church of Rochester, recently gave the following statistics: "There are thirty-two missionaries. Of these, 244 were from England, 131 from Germany, 117 from the United States and 67 from Scotland. There were also 15a female missionaries who acted as teachers and visitors among the women. Further, there were nearly 400 ordained native missionaries, some of whom were preaching with great power and eloquence. There were employed by missionaries 6,500 teachers, instructing 180,000 scholars."

—The Free Church of Scotland Monthly says of Bainbridge's "Round the world tour of Christian missions:" "Having visited nearly all the missions described by the writer, who made a tour of fifty thousand miles, occupying two years in time, we can testify to his general accuracy, intelligence and fine missionary spirit. He is most fair in the references to the missions of the Free Church of Scotland, although he fails, we think, from the rapidity of his survey, to do justice to their relation to education."

—A missionary village has been started as an experiment near Zafferal, India. The converts have built for themselves comfortable little houses. They cultivate small farms or patches of ground in the neighborhood, in various ways earn their livelihood, and are living in tolerable comfort. They have their own schools, and in these are children and old men and women—fathers and mothers and grandfathers and grandmothers—all acquiring together the simplest elements of education.

—The Bush Missionary Society at Sydney, Australia, employs five missionaries, who are each provided with a wagonette and a pair of horses for traveling and the conveyance of Bibles, religious books and tracts, for sale and distribution.

—Dr. Sheldon Jackson is about to visit again the Presbyterian missions in Alaska, taking with him a saw-mill for Hydah. The four central points of the mission are Fort Wrangel, Sitka, Chilkats, and Hydah.

—A new Presbyterian Church in the Puyallup Reservation, Puget Sound Washington Territory, erected by Indians, was recently dedicated. The "Reservation" is admirably named.

Fifteen Indian youth from Capt. Pratt's school, Carlisle, Penn., were recently received into the Second Presbyterian Church at that place.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CINCINNATI ROMAN CATHOLIC COUNCIL.—The fourth of the Provincial Councils of Cincinnati, which was made an archdiocese in 1850, has just adjourned. Some important decrees were adopted, one of which bears directly upon the scandal growing out of the banking operations of Archbishop Purcell, who was in too feeble a state of health to be present. It is well, perhaps, to say, in this connection, that a Provincial Council can only make ecclesiastical regulations for its own dioceses, and its decrees only become binding when approved by the Pope. The Archdiocese of Cincinnati includes the sees of Cleveland, Columbus, Covington, Detroit, Fort Wayne, Louisville, and Vincennes, and has a Catholic population of 882,000, with about 1,000 priests.

On Sunday, March 19, the decrees adopted by the Council, were publicly read and solemnly subscribed by the Bishop with great pomp and ceremony. They will be sent to the Propaganda at Rome, and by the secretary of that body submitted to the Congregatio Concilii, upon whose approval they will have the force of law. The Catholic Telegraph gives a synopsis of the decrees, with this apology:

"Whilst it would undoubtedly be decidedly improper and dangerously premature to publish a verbatim et literatim statement, we can see no harm in giving general particulars, especially as more than twelve months will probably elapse before confirmatory letters will be returned from Rome and the decrees be publicly promulgated."

The first decree declares the allegiance of the Bishops to the Holy See and their adherence to the dogma of Papal Infallibility which was defined since the last Council of the Province. The second decree has reference to the conduct, dress, and training of the clergy, who are exhorted to live a godly life, to wear the Roman collar when in civilian dress, and to abstain from visiting operas and theaters. The duties of parochial priests are described, and rules are prescribed for the examination of ecclesiastical students and of priests for the first seven years. The third decree relates to the administration of ecclesiastical finance and is regarded as the most important of all.

"No priest" [we quote the summary of the Telegraph] "in charge of a congregation will be allowed to incur a debt on behalf of his church of more than $100 without the special sanction of his ordinary. Should he fail to heed this admonition, he may be deposed from his office and be unworthy of promotion for a term of five years. Every priest having the care of a congregation shall make a financial report at least once a year, which he shall read to his parishioners, after mass, on a Sunday in the month of January. In such report shall be embodied a list containing the names of all the creditors and of moneys due them, when loaned, and the date at which the notes will arrive at maturity. No rector shall receive money in his own name, nor so spend it. He shall receive a 'fitting stipend for his services, for 'the laborer is worthy of his hire.' No new churches, renovations of those existing, repairs or restorations to school buildings shall be commenced without first consulting the Bishop of the diocese in which they are situated. Every report of the administration of ecclesiastical finance shall be inspected and countersigned by the ordinary, in his own name, and shall also bear that of the priest."

The fourth decree condemns the practice of mixed marriages, as "most detestable" to the church, and insists upon the triple publication of banns and careful scrutiny of canonical impediments. The fifth decree exhorts parents to send their children to the Catholic schools, and warns them of the grave danger of patronizing the public schools. If they disregard this admonition without cause, they are to be refused sacramental absolution in the sacred tribunal of penance. The sixth decree concerns Catholic societies and confraternities, and the seventh is directed against secret societies. The eight decree commends the use of Gregorian and Cecilian music.

The Council was closed with a short address by Bishop Elder, president.—New York Independent.

—The numbers of the religious journals published by the different denominations in this country are as follows: Adventists have 14; Baptists, 73; Christians, 2; Congregationalists, 15; Campbellites, 12; Dunkers, 3; Episcopalians, 32; Evangelical Association, 12; Moravians, 7; Israelites, 16; Lutherans, 82; Mennonites, 7; Methodists, 75; Mormons, 6; Presbyterians, 39; Quakers, 6; Reformed, 10; Roman Catholics, 67; Spiritualists, 6; Swedenborgians, 3; Unitarians, 5; Universalists, 7; United Brethren, 6; Non-denominational, 11. Of the Lutheran journals there are 30 German, 27 English, 6 Swedish, 15 Norwegian, and 4 Danish.

—Dr. John Hall's Church, in New York, besides $328,597 for congregational purposes, gives more than $30,000 a year for its city mission work. It gives also $20,000 to the Presbyterian Home and Foreign Mission Boards, and to the other Boards in the same proportions; and to the general agencies, such as Bible, Tract, and City Missionary Societies, $227,984. Dr. Prime says that, while the richest body of Christians in the United States, it is not less ahead in its recognition of the principle of Christian benevolence.

—It is interesting to notice that, according to late religious censuses of numerous towns in England and Wales, the Baptists and Congregationalists keep very near together. In towns having an aggregate population of 3,-585,395 the Baptists have 274 buildings, with accommodation for 124,340 persons and a total attendance at three services on Sunday of 113,832. The Congregationalists have in the same towns 209 buildings, with accommodation for 137,524 persons and an attendance of 118,491.

—The recent Episcopal Convention in Danville, Va., in solemn council affirmed: "We believe that the time has arrived when our parochial clergy should recognize the fact that the Negroes within their parochial bounds are an integral part of their parochial work, and that such work can not longer be ignored or neglected."

—The Internal Presbyterian Conference of Australia, which is held every other year, meets in April. The meeting of the General Assembly of Australia will not, therefore, take place till March, 1883.

—The native Christians of the United Presbyterian Mission in Egypt gave last year nearly three dollars each in their missionary contributions.

—The Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, has expended $13,000 in improvements. Seven churches in the same diocese have paid off indebtedness to the sum of $75,000.

Professor Robertson Smith has received the degree of LL. D. from Aberdeen University. His lectures on Old Testment prophecy have been completed and will be published.

—Spurgeon's Pastors' College has 355 graduates preaching in Great Britian, who have gathered 43,330 persons into the churches.

—The Free Church of Scotland will be represented at the celebration of the centenary of the edict of toleration in Bohemia by Dr. Laughton, moderator of the General Assembly, and by others.

—Mrs. Dr. Talmage has a Bible class of two hundred ladies. She is said to be a very bright, intelligent woman, and a very fine Bible teacher.

—The American Unitarian Association has voted $500 to help sustain Unitarian preaching at Buda Pest, Hungary.

—Dr. E. G. Robinson, of Brown University, will deliver the Lyman Beecher lectures at Yale this year.

Our Young People.

THE BOYS.

Whatever you are, be brave boys!
The liar's a coward and slave, boys;
Though clever at cheats,
And sharp at excuses,
He's a sneaking and pitiful knave, boys.

Whatever you are, be frank, boys,
'Tis better than money and rank, boys.
Still cleave to the right;
Be lovers of fight;
Be open above board and frank, boys.

Whatever you are, be kind, boys;
Be gentle in manner and mind, boys.
The man gentle in mein,
Words and temper, I ween,
Is the gentleman truly refined, boys.

But whatever you are, be true, boys;
Be visible through and through, boys.
Leave to others the shamming,
The "creeping" and "cramming";
In fun and in earnest, be true, boys.

Shut-Eye-Town.

On the sloping side of a hill, just where the shadows fall darkest from the high peaks, is built this quaint old city of Shut-eye-town.

Indeed, the sides of the hill are so steep that the little houses must be propped up with pillars made of wood or iron. About the whole city is built a wall high and strong.

Four gates lead into the principal streets, and they are hung on hinges of rubber. These gates move back and forth so noiselessly that the people inside know nothing of it. The houses are small and lined with soft velvets and feathers; they are of the most queer shapes and sizes. The people who live there look like ghosts in their long white robes. They are exceedingly peaceable, and always quiet. I think I never heard of such a thing as a fight or even a quarrel inside the walls of Shut-eye-town. There are birds there, heaps of them, but they never sing; they are as silent as the people. They sit with their little heads twisted to one side, and their wings over their faces. There are cats and dogs and chickens and horses and cows, but they never mew, nor bark, nor crow, nor neigh. There are flowers there, too, but they hang down their sweet heads and cry great tears because the big sun never comes around that way. The boys and girls in Shut-eye-town never sing, or laugh, or skip, or go to school, or have picnics. I have visited this strange city many times in my life. Indeed, I can not remember when I first went. I like the place so much, and have become so used to going there, that I feel very much disappointed and sometimes even cross if I fail to take my usual journey to the city on the hill. I once knew four little men, whose mamma told them, one evening, that it was high time they were off to Shut-eye-town. But those naughty chaps set up such a screeching and screaming that their mamma was much troubled to know what to do. She was thinking of some plan to follow, and the lads were rolling on the floor, when in walked the great, fat, kind-looking old mayor of the city of Shut-eye. His name was Very Sleepy, Esq., and he carried a great knapsack on his right arm. All the children liked this kind old man. He stopped but a moment to whisper something to the boys, and as he spoke he dropped on eight eye-lids eight tiny weights. Those weights, though so small, held the lids down so firmly that the four little men could no longer hold them open. Directly in came the big mayor again, and gathering them up in his arms, he carried them off inside the high walls, and shut the big gates fast and safe.

He treated the boys very kindly, as he does all the people who visit his city. He took them to ride in a balloon that had wings like an eagle's; and they visited a cave with the walls made of diamonds; they saw dogs with elephant's ears, and elephants with long necks like the giraffe; they saw horses with wings; and rats with pink tails and blue eyes; there were robins with horns; and cows that could sing and dance; there were tops that would buzz by touching a spring; and rabbits that played at base-ball. Such wonderful sights and such wonderful sounds as these four lads did see and hear.

Just as the sun lighted up the high peaks the big mayor opened all the gates, and down in the town by the river the bells began to ring and the whistles to blow; and out came all the people, the birds, the flowers, the horses and cows, and Shut-eye-town was left desolate. I love this city on the hill, for it makes people who go there look brighter and happier; when they are tired it rests them; when they are cross it makes them kinder; when they are sick, to go inside this cozy city is more sure to make them well again.—New York Tribune.

Crown-Jewels.

The crown-jewels of France are soon to be exposed for public sale, and, as we learn from private letters, there is an uncomfortable apprehension felt, even by the most pronounced republicans in Paris, lest these great historic symbols of royalty should fall into the possession of rich Americans. However anxious they may be to destroy the Empire in France, they do not quite relish the thought that the regal symbols of its ancient splendors should sparkle on the breast of the wife of some bonanza king from Nevada or California, who probably began life as a laborer.

Among these jewels is the famous "Regent Diamond," valued at four million dollars. It has had a most dramatic history. It was found in the mine of Parteal near Golconda, and was stolen by the discoverer, who escaped with it to Europe, and sold it in England. It was bought for the French crown when Louis XV. was a minor, and since then has been the especial symbol of that monarch.

The mob, after Louis XVI. was beheaded, demanded to see it, and it was shown to them by their leaders, who, however, took care to carefully chain it. The communists and half-crazed women of St. Antoine cursed and spit upon it with as much virulence as though it had been Marie Antoinette herself. The Regent is the most valuable and beautiful diamond in the world.

The Portuguese crown-jewels are famous for their value and beauty. Among the crown-jewels of Queen Victoria is the Koh-i-noor, which dates back over two thousand years. It was seized by the English at the time of the sacking of Lahore. Its lustre would add more grace to the British crown if it had been obtained by some other means.

A singular story is told of the Regalia of Scotland. They disappeared for many years, and were supposed to have been stolen. Sir Walter Scott found in an old letter a hint which led him to believe that they were still hidden in Edinburgh Castle.

He obtained a search-warrant, and carefully examining the ancient crown-room, found that the wall varied in thickness. Workmen and tools were procured and an excavation made in the masonry. An immense crowd of loyal Scots filled the streets outside, awaiting the result.

A secret chamber was discovered, within which was a chest. It was forced open, and there lay the crown-jewels of Scotland. A flag was run up and a cannon fired, and a wild shout of rejoicing arose from the multitude.

So closely is the power of the kingdom associated with these its outward symbols, that when the sceptre and crown of auld Scotia were found, it seemed to her sons that her ancient glory had returned with them.

A Girl's Tact and Courage.

The Revolution of 1776 not only tried men's souls, but the women's also. Many anecdotes are still told which illustrate the tact and courage of the noble women who sacrificed much to the colonies' independence. One of these anecdotes, the scene of which is laid in Flatbush, New York, shows the strong sympathy of a girl of sixteen for the patriot's cause and her courage in exhibiting it.

King's county, Long Island, was for a long time, during the war, occupied by the British. Soldiers were quartered upon the inhabitants, to whom policy, therefore, dictated a wise reticence as to their sympathies. But one girl would not disguise her sentiments, though her mother often checked her boldness.

One day a line of artillery wagons was passing. The driver of the foremost wagon, anxious to avoid a mud-hole, turned his horses upon the side-walk in front of her house. Of course, all the other drivers would follow his lead. The sixteen-year-old girl, determined to prevent this desecration, rushed out of the house and so frightened the team which followed that the horses overturned the wagon. There was a storm, which required the presence of the mother to allay. But an old German doctor, attached to one of the English regiments, saw the girl's attack, and laughed immoderately over it.

"Ah, vat a heroine vas our leetle Femmetia!" he said, laughingly, to a Hessian officer. "She attack dese big artillery men! She attack him wis a broomstick! She's our brave leetle lady!"

Notwithstanding the presence of the British troops, the patriotic citizens of Kings county loaned large sums of money for the advancement of the American cause. An agent went around secretly collecting the money, as his life would have been taken if he had been caught. One day, the girl's mother was counting out a sum of gold to this agent. Looking up, she saw a British officer enter the door yard.

"Femmetia, she said to her daughter, "hurry out and meet that officer, and don't let him come in this room as you value your life. Don't fail us now, child."

The daughter obeyed. She met the officer and was so entertaining that he did not seek to enter the house until after the money had been gathered and the agent hidden. It was the first and last time that her mother complimented her for entertaining a British officer.

The Black Bear's Cunning.

In the Century for March, Charles C. Ward has an entertaining illustrated article on "The Black Bear," in which he describes Bruin's haunts in Maine and New Brunswick, relates several hunting incidents, and depicts Bruin's peculiarities, in part as follows:

I really think that Bruin possesses the sense of humor; at all events his actions point that way, and there is no doubt that he is extremely cunning and observing. I once had an English friend visiting me, who played the flute. He was in the habit of marching up and down, while playing, near a tame bear I had at the time. The bear had a piece of stick about two feet long, which he tossed about for amusement. After a time, he came to handle to stick very much as my friend did his flute. This annoyed my sensitive friend, and in revenge he teased the bear with uncouth noises. Bruin sniffed and winked, and waited his opportunity for delivering a tremendous blow with his paw at his enemy, whose tall hat was knocked completely over his eyes. He escaped being scalped by dropping flat and rolling out of the reach of the bear. This bear spent much of his time in the tree to which he was chained, and when climbing usually got his chain twisted over and under the branches in a most intricate manner, but never failed to take out every turn as he descended. A friend of mine who owned a tame bear told me that, for a long time, he could not account for the mysterious way in which the poultry disappeared. Observing, at different times, a good many feathers around Bruin's pole, he began to suspect that the bear was the culprit. Close watching confirmed his suspicions. When Bruin thought he was unobserved, he would seize any unfortunate hen or chicken within his reach and devour it; but if any one approached before he could complete the meal, he would sit upon his prey until the danger of discovery had passed. He was betrayed, at last, by the cackling of an old hen that he had failed to silence.

TIME KEEPERS.—Before the invention of clocks and watches, time was measured by the length of shadows. To-day, this method largely prevails in the East, where, if a man is asked what o'clock it is, he will look at his shadow, pace it off and tell the time very nearly. In the seventh chapter of Job we find, "As a servant earnestly desireth his shadow"—the shadow that will tell the hour when his labors for the day end. This led to the sun-dial, in which the shadow of a gnomon—perpendicular pin-cast by the sun, falls upon a graduated arc; the shadow pointing toward the west at sunrise, directly north at noon, and eastward at sunset. Then came the sand-glass, which noted the time by the running of dry and carefully sized sand through a minute opening between two conical glass vessels, placed one above the other and joined at the small ends. Most likely you all have seen one. It answered very well in the daytime, though when the upper vessel had become empty, it was rather inconvenient to turn it upside down; but it was of no use in the night, unless some one was employed to tend it, as was frequently the case among the wealthy.

About the General Conference.

By this time we imagine the questions to be considered by the approaching General Conference have been pretty well determined. Opinions, suggestions and advice have been largely ventilated through the church papers, and some conclusions may have been reached.

In regard to our relations with the Methodist Episcopal Church there will probably be no discussion, and certainly no action looking to organic union. The plan of three General Conferences, with a supreme council, for American Methodism, meets with no favor in the North, and with very little in the South. It is chimerical, impracticable. Organic union or none is the sentiment of the North, and the South is not prepared to be swallowed up and controlled by the North. The change of name may come up in some form, but we do not believe that it will receive much favor.

On the subject of fraternity there is nothing more to be done. We are fraternal, and there is the end of the matter. Fraternal, and nothing more. Fraternal messengers will be received courteously, and will have a respectful hearing. It is to be desired, on several accounts, that henceforth our fraternal communications with other religious bodies should be conducted by written correspondence. It would save much valuable time, also considerable money, and the corresponding bodies would have the opportunity of considering and adopting the message to be delivered. A platform address, by a fraternal delegate, may or may not express the sentiments of those whom he is authorized to represent. Communications of this sort should be prepared by a committee, and sent forth as the authorized words of the General Conference.

The policy or expediency of organizing a Church Extension Society will be entertained and probably adopted. It will take some time to make such an organization effective; but some plan by which the strong can help the weak, and by which the waste places, frontiers, and rapidly multiplying railroad centers, can be supplied with houses of worship, is most urgently needed. This is a work special and specific, and can not well be combined with the operations of our foreign and domestic missions. It would, however, be in some sense supplemental to our domestic missionary work, and supply the connectional bond which it lacks.

Sunday-school matters will probably receive more than usual attention, and a section may be inserted in the Discipline in which everything pertaining to this branch of church work shall be placed. It is not likely that any new policy will be inaugurated in regard to our Publishing House. As it now seems to be doing well, the General Conference will probably commend the faithful book agent and committee, and continue the present method of business. A Church Educational Board will be advocated, and we see no reason why it should not be adopted, provided its practical importance can be established. Beyond the unnecessary multiplication of machinery, it can do no harm, and it may unify and invigorate our enterprise in this most vital interest.

The subject of foreign missions is second to none, but our organization—including the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society—is effective, and will need but little if any additional legislation. If anything can be done to arouse our people for this cause, and to supply the means for larger undertakings, it will be. The past four years have been the brightest of our history in the foreign missionary department. But we must look for much greater things in the next quadrennial period.

As for changes in the Discipline, many will doubtless be referred to the proper committees, and very few adopted. Some perfecting touches here and there will be given to the old book, but nothing to much disturb the old order. We predict that the present pastoral term will remain, that the presiding eldership will not be modified, and that, for the most part, things will "remain as they were since the fathers fell asleep."

The approach of a General Conference is the signal for ecclesiastical iconoclasts to begin their work of destruction, and for all restless and venturesome spirits to see where changes can be made. Just to hear or read of these multitudinous suggestions, would make the impression that the whole economy of Methodism is about to be broken up and reconstructed. The outcome, however, is very conservative. "Non-concurrence" will be the vote in most cases. Southern Methodists need not tremble for the ark. It will not fall into the hands of the Philistines soon—probably never. Piety and good sense predominate in the church at large, and also in the General Conference. The action of such a body, as will meet at Nashville in May, is very apt to be right.

The election of Bishops and connectional officers attracts probably more attention than it deserves. It is a very important part of the work of the General Conference, but, in comparison with its other business, it is only one of many things that demands the most careful and conscientious treatment. This it will receive, and God will doubtless direct to a wise and happy issue.

Natural and right as it is that the thought of the church should be turned toward the General Conference, there is in it this danger, that we should be diverted from our great work at home of laboring for revivals and the conversion of souls. This, after all, is the main thing, and nothing that the General Conference can do can compensate for negligence in this respect. While we pray for the General Conference, let us also press the home battle to the gates of the enemy.

Christian Comfort.

The gospel is peculiarly rich in the element of consolation. As compared with the earlier and less perfect dispensations of revelation, it much more abounds. In contrast with unbelief, it shines resplendent amidst the thick darkness of infidelity. In nothing is Christianity lifted above all other religious systems, and all schools of philosophy, than in this feature of helpfulness to souls in distress. With all its other aspects of wealth this is its most regal affluence.

In a dispensation of the Spirit, the Spirit himself is described as the Comforter. The Savior charged himself largely with the ministry of hope. Providence and redemption are made to yield the greatest measure of assurance to the distressed. He is himself the consolation of Israel. The confirmation of the promise by an oath was to the end that "we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us." It is emphatically a strong consolation that the gospel affords to those who seek for shelter in Christ.

It is an adequate support that it proffers, a very present help in trouble, a strength and refuge in the most trying circumstances. It explains the mystery of suffering by pointing us to the things that are not seen, and by investing affliction with the character of a gracious discipline, ennobling and purifying to the heart and life here, and bearing fruit in the realms of light beyond the grave. However suffering is connected with sin, either as a penalty or as a discipline, there is divine love in it. In the impenitent its office is to awaken and humble and draw the soul to Christ; in the believer it is to bring the heart nearer to God, and to train it in the graces of submission and faith, and to deliver from the bondage of sin. The rod is in the Father's hand, and the chastisement is administered in love, and not in wrath.

There is no conceivable trouble that can befall us that may not be met by a complete consolation. History and observation demonstrate this. It has been proved in the extreme afflictions of the devout, and in their dying declarations. Christianity claims to be the sufficient comfort in this world of tribulation, and it is.

And yet, in attaining to this comfort, Christians as often fail as they do in the performance of active duties. They do not get out of the gospel the balm that it has for them. They do not make the most of this special feature of the Divine grace. Some are comfortless because their religion has come short of a heartfelt experience of converting power. Their religion is an opinion, mechanical and theoretical, rather than experimental. In such case they are not sure of God or of a future life. To them the gospel may seem a cunningly devised fable. There is in the heart nothing that confirms the declarations of the Word. They are strangers to the felt operations of the Holy Spirit. In the hour of trial their religion yields them no support, because their hearts have never been cheered by the hope that maketh not ashamed. The love of God has never been shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost.

In better case than this are many who have some measure of light in the darkness, but it does not dispel all the shadows. The sufferings of this present time are permitted to cloud the glory that shall be revealed. They do not take in the full and gracious significance of the ordeal through which they are passing. They endure with a wavering faith, but they do not rejoice in tribulation. They lose the real comfort, the strong consolation, by failure to appropriate the promises of God, and by failure to discern the love there is in their trials.

And there are kinds of affliction, and especially the more common and trivial annoyances of life, to which we hesitate to apply the consolations of religion. It is perhaps the burden of weariness and poverty, or the worry of every day affairs. As if these were not worthy the thought of God, or the sympathy of the ascended and living Saviour.

It is so, that Christians are often strangers to the fulness and greatness of the consolations within their reach. The blessings of a perfect peace and of a joy unspeakable are within their reach, but bowed, broken and sore, they seem to decline the great happiness, and to refuse the benediction which the divine Master is ready to invoke upon them.

The Bereans.

St. Luke says that the Bereans "were more noble than the Thessalonians." This nobleness consisted in two things—"they received the word with all readiness of mind," and "they searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so." Their minds were open to receive the preaching of the apostles, and they consulted the sacred books to learn if that preaching was in accord with the teaching of the books. The result of this process was that "many of them believed; also of honorable women, which were Greeks, and of men, not a few." Such readiness to hear preaching, and diligence to compare the preaching with the teachings of the Bible, the sacred historian characterizes as nobleness. Such practices always issue in a firmer faith. When the word of the Lord confirms and corroborates the preaching of the pulpit, the hearer listens to two witnesses giving evidence upon the same point, and whatever doubts he may have had, begin to give way, and faith begins to grow. The apostles, in their preaching, continually brought forward the Scriptures as giving testimony to the truth of their preaching. "Opening and alleging out of the Scriptures" was the way they preached. Hence, when the hearers were diligent to "search the Scriptures whether those things were so," faith was confirmed, and growth in grace followed. This shows clearly that preaching does not take the place of reading the Scriptures, and that reading the Scriptures can not supplant the preaching of the word.

The two have appropriate places, and each has its proper function in the gospel plan of salvation, and no person, in reach of them, can neglect either without detriment and danger to the spiritual interests. The true gospel preacher to-day appeals directly to the word of God in support of the truth of his preaching, and the hearer who is simply content to take the preaching without this corroborative testimony has simply got the truth in a diluted form. Diluted truth is not as nutritious to the soul as pure truth. Hence we account for the fact of so many lean Christians. They attend the preaching and the social meetings of the church, but not searching the Scriptures to see if the preaching is according to the word of God, they never come in personal contact with the truth, in its purity, and the consequence is they can not attain unto a vigorous spirituality. The Apostle Peter exhorts people to "desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." The word means "the unmixed milk," "the unadulterated milk," "the pure milk," and, of course, this can only be found in "the pure words of the Lord." And the phrase, "that ye may grow thereby," shows very clearly the thing upon which growth in religion actually depends. The man, then, who would have a healthy, vigorous spiritual life must not simply be a "hearer of the word;" he must also be a diligent searcher into the Scriptures to find out for himself if the preaching is true. If our people would spend Sabbath evenings in searching the Scriptures in regard to the doctrines and exhortations of the morning sermon, they would be greatly more benefitted than by going again to hear another sermon. Hearing preaching and reading the word have got out of their relations to each other, and the result is not beneficial. The nobleness of the Bereans is commended to the people of God.

The Labor Problem.

On this subject we find the following extract from an address by C. K. Marshall, D. D., in the Vicksburg Herald:

Planters are more and more disheartened in their endeavors to obtain satisfactory results from employing the freedmen. In spite of every effort, not over one hundred and twenty-five or thirty days' work are performed by them, on an average, from year to year. I mean what would be called days' work if rendered by white men. To expect independence, comfort and wealth from such dawdling pretences of industry is to seek for grapes upon thorns, and figs upon thistles.

In some parts of the South planters are importing white labor from foreign countries. This is the policy we advocate, provided they have families and may purchase the soil, settle and become citizens—not otherwise. We had a friend who brought sixty reliable laborers from a Western city. One of them had a family, and he remained the year out; all the others were gone in less than four months. They became tramps, perhaps burglars and thieves, loafers and beggars.

When a white man is brought to our soil to take the shoes and cabin of the vanishing negro he soon takes in the situation, feels degraded, thinks he has been deceived, and secretly resolves to get away on any terms, at any time, by any means. No; what we want are families—colonies of good, industrious families, and they will at one and the same time enrich us, and grow rich, useful and happy themselves.

We are in a tumble-down condition. We have relied on the negro. Cotton is a tyrant. Cotton dominates us. Cotton is our bane. A cotton-field is always near a poor-house in this palsied period of the century. To make it is no longer the pursuit of a gentleman, as once it was. It is the task of a man who in his soul feels little more self-respect than a tramp, and the sooner its culture is made a mere surplus crop to a true farm, and the owner of a hundred acres shall feel that he has land enough, the better it will be for the entire commonwealth.

But now we boast of many acres, nine-twelfths of which are adorned by the emancipation growth, known as sedge grass, and the plantation is "worked." In spots and sporadic patches, with vast reaches of untilled and barren wastes between. And many of the owners of such places have neither butter, milk, eggs, chickens, pigs or desirable gardens. Nor can they help themselves. They are manacled by iron habits. They were born on a cotton plantation, swaddled in cotton garments, learned to purchase oats, hay, mules, horses, plows and cotton baskets, with cotton; paid cotton for corn, exchanged it for rice, molasses and whisky; gave cotton for brooms, axe-handles, hoe-handles and ox-yokes; sent cotton to Illinois for hams, sides, fowls, apples and oleomargerine, a counterfeit butter; bought of New York condensed milk, preserved fruits and dried peaches—with cotton; gave lint cotton for cotton plow lines, wooden buckets, iron caskets—I name caskets, because a cypress coffin, costing twenty dollars, will last many years longer than the common one hundred dollar iron casket—willow cradles, window sashes, doors, split-bottom chairs, carts, wagons, spokes, hubs, plow-handles, pulpits, pews and cotton cloth. Cotton is to-day a double curse to the South. Let us prove to the North that we are no longer content to be the miserable hangers on upon their industry, ingenuity and manufacturing skill, but are manly enough to utilize our own raw material, and develop our own country.

But the stereotyped old people can not do it. Will the young people try, or will they go West to perish? Our early habits of rulership, mastery, the slave labor system, and now partnerships, forbid our facile acceptance of new enterprises, and fresh methods of money-making. But young men may do it.

Now, let us suppose ten young men were to unite their hands, and get planters around them who have thousands of idle acres once under the plow, to place them in pool, and open a plan for a colony, they would soon find the immigrants, and, once settled amongst us, would assist in re-creating the South, and all sorts of home manufacturing would spring up as it has done at New Braunfels, in Texas. Our cities and towns would double their populations, and the South would be regenerated and redeemed. Besides, it is easy to see how the enterprise of creating a colony would be highly remunerative to the company.

The State can not give lands. She has none to bestow. But a Legislature could greatly aid in the work, and, unless they do take the matter in hand, we shall be a ruined people. It helps us but little for farmers from Georgia, Alabama or North Carolina to come here. That is singing the same dirge of desolation. We need the crossing of blood and fresh energy to be independent of negro labor. We need skill to manufacture, habits of frugality, men of sober ways, who will not loaf around dead falls, bar-rooms and card-tables.

One of the saddest things we see is the great number of young men who are constantly leaving our State for remote and doubtful territory. This weakens the common wealth, reduces the churches, destroys the hope of families, puts merchandise, manufacture, agriculture and the grand moulding of society into the hands of transitory adventurers, and leaves the old folks behind to pine away as strangers in the homes of their birth, and die in solitude. And what can a new country do better than our own? Will a new country plow itself, and hoe its own furrows, build fences, shingle the house and grind the grist? The sons hear farming decried. Farming, the real, proper pursuit of a gentleman, the most independent, dignified and manly of all the callings of men, consecrated by God's special benediction and promise, the occupation of patriarchs, prophets, kings, statesmen. This divine vocation is undervalued in the hearing of sons and aspiring youth, who are thus misled, and taught that a clerkship, a tape-seller, a man behind a counter bickering over corsets, stockings, garters, hoop-skirts and spool-thread, the appropriate occupation of young women, is more respectable than tilling the ground, and securing God's own bonds and golden nuggets of permanent wealth. But we must close with one word.

One of our prime necessities is leaders, apostles, teachers, wise, unselfish, honorable citizens, men for the hour, men to speak to the people, to command them, rouse them, inspire them, lead them, recreate society, re-organize labor, lift up the prone masses, shame our idleness, rebuke our despondency, animate our lethargy, encourage our young men, touch the rock where the imprisoned waters await the stroke of a leader's rod, and cause the flowing stream to fertilize society, its institutions, its soil, and fill the land once more with gladness, with plenty, with song and with boundless prosperity. The wilderness and the solitary places shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.

General Conference Chronology.

From a specimen number of the Daily Christian Advocate, to be issued by the Publishing House during the approaching session of the General Conference, we copy the following interesting items of our church history:

1812. The first delegated General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America—including Canada—met in New York, May, 1812. All the members of that Conference are dead.

1816. The second Conference convened in Baltimore, May, 1816. Not a single member of that Conference is living.

1820. The third session was held also in Baltimore, in 1820. We know of no one living who was a member of that Conference.

1824. The Conference of 1824 convened again in Baltimore. We know of no one living who was a member of that Conference, except Robert Paine, now our senior Bishop.

1828. In 1828 the Conference convened at Pittsburgh, Pa. Of all the delegates from the territory now occupied by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, only four are living: Robert Paine, F. A. Owen and Ashley B. Roszell, from the Tennessee Conference, and Peter Akers, from Kentucky. Dr. Akers is now connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Illinois.

1832. The Conference met in Philadelphia. The only Southern delegates of that Conference remaining are Bishop H. H. Kavanaugh and the Rev. Dr. Peter Akers; then of the Kentucky Conference, and Bishop Paine, G. T. Henderson and F. A. Owen, of the Tennessee Conference.

1836. The Conference was held in Cincinnati, Ohio. Of the delegates from the Southern Conferences at that meeting there remain only Bishop Kavanaugh, Bishop Paine, G. T. Henderson, and J. B. McFerrin, of Tennessee, and William Murrah, of Alabama, now of the North Mississippi Conference. The venerable Wesley Browning, of the St. Louis Conference, was a delegate, but was from the Pittsburgh Conference.

1840. The Conference of 1840 convened in Baltimore. The Southern delegates now living are Thomas N. Ralston, of Kentucky; Robert Paine and J. B. McFerrin, of Tennessee; William Murrah, of Alabama, and H. P. Pierce, of Georgia.

1844. The General Conference met at New York. Southern delegates still living: Jerome C. Berryman, of Missouri; H. H. Kavanaugh, of Kentucky; Robert Paine, and J. B. McFerrin, of Tennessee, Memphis Conference, Thomas Joiner; Arkansas Conference, Andrew Hunter; Alabama Conference, Jesse Boring; and William Murrah; Georgia Conference, George F. Pierce and J. E. Evans; North Carolina Conference, Bennett T. Blake; Virginia Conference, L. M. Lee.

1845. The convention of Southern delegates met in Louisville, May 1, 1845. There were present ninety-eight members; of these seventy-seven have passed away, leaving only twenty-one yet in the work of the Master. How rapidly are the ranks thinning! In reviewing the past we are pleased to say there were giants in the former years of the Methodist Church. May the strength of our ministry never be diminished.

A Short Session.

Bishop Pierce writes, in the Nashville Christian Advocate, of the approaching General Conference, in the following sensible way:

The approaching General Conference seems to be a very suggestive event. The papers, secular and religious, abound with statements, conjectures and prophecies about what will be done, what is likely to be done, and what ought to be done. All these deliverances are without authority or knowledge, and, in my judgment, are wide of the mark, and very misleading. The introduction by anybody, of any vexatious, agitating topic, will be very unwise, and will involve great waste of time without any compensating benefit. The church is quiet everywhere in our borders. No very important legislation is asked for, nor is any expected by the great body of our people.

The question of the reunion of Methodism, North and South, is not up. It will not be before us officially, nor is there any competent authority in the premises before the Northern General Conference. Irresponsible invitations, the published opinions and wishes of a few gushing brethren here and there, amount to nothing. We must respect ourselves, and bide our time. In the meanwhile I think I speak advisedly when I say the common sentiment of our people is that organic union is neither practicable nor desirable. Let us have peace by letting disturbing questions alone.

The chief business of the occasion will be the election of Bishops to fill the vacancies made by death, and to provide for the enlargement and more effective working of our missionary and Sunday-school plans. It seems to me that all needed work can be promptly disposed of. The session may be, and ought to be, a short one. Private pressing business will demand the presence of the lay members at home, presiding elders will be needed on their districts, college presidents and professors ought to be with their classes, stationed preachers and circuit preachers ought to be at their posts of duty and labor. A protracted session at Nashville would be a calamity to the church.

I am looking for a revival year. The indications are full of promise. More religion is the need of the times. Changing "ors" and "ands" in the Discipline is a very small affair compared with the conversion of sinners. I have hope of a short, useful session. May the great Head of the church preside over us, and enrich our Zion with a full salvation.

Our Numbers.

Our book editor, Dr. Summers, in his Nashville Notes, Nashville Christian Advocate, April 15, says:

I have just finished editing and passing through the press the General Minutes for 1881. I have gone through all the arithmetic with great care and an excellent accountant, Mr. Towson, one of our Biblical students, assisted me in the work—a tedious and troublesome job. But it is done, and the result makes a good showing. I give a summary: Traveling preachers, 3,704; superannuated preachers, 707; local preachers, 5,865; white members, 841,367; colored members, 193; Indian members, 5,151; total ministers and members, 860,087—being an increase last year of 12, 981. Sunday-Schools, 9,310; teachers, 62,444; scholars, 462,321—increase last year, 21,707; for Conference claimants, $77,013.88—increase $3,563 93; for Missions—not including Woman's Missionary Society, nor sporadic contributions—$161,486 70—increase, $11,724 68.

It will be seen from the above that the total increase in members in the past year was nearly thirteen thousand. This is a good showing compared with that of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The membership of that church is nearly double that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and yet it has been stated that in it there was a decrease of members last year. We believe the most that has been claimed for it is an increase of four or five thousand. We ought not to be satisfied with an increase of thirteen thousand. Let us rather work for fifty thousand. Bishop Pierce calls for a revival this year. The whole church should awake to this work. The people are perishing in their sins.

Among the Editors.

Watchman, Boston.

Much has been said about the decadence of religion. So numerous and positive have been the assertions as to the diminished attendance at places of worship, and the lost hold of religious doctrines upon the people, that many have come to believe in the actual existence of an occasion for cheerless if not hopeless lamentations over the prevailing irreligiousness of our day. Neither the premises nor the conclusions are correct in regard to this matter. There is not so much neglect of public worship as is generally supposed to exist, and religious influences are vastly more potent than they seem to be, as considered by the friendly as well as the unfriendly. Many would be greatly surprised by going from one place to another, as observers of worshipping congregations, to find the average attendance so large as it is. If it has been diminishing during the past decade until recently, the tide is now turning, and the number of gospel hearers is widely, if not generally, increasing.

As much mistaken is the quite common impression that the power of religion is lessened and lessening. Truthfully does the London Guardian say that "in spite of anti-religious manifestations, there never was a time when religion commanded a larger and more intelligent interest than in these days." In confirmation of this statement it is said that theological books took the lead in the literary publications of England for 1881. The fact is well-known that American publishers are unwilling to print the writings of professed atheists, because of the small demand for such publications. Biblical truth is more generally accepted than it was twenty years ago, and there is less room in the pulpit for sensationalism than there has been, heretofore, during two thirds of a generation.

Nashville Christian Advocate.

Two questions absorb our women. The first is, What did she wear? The second is, What did it cost? It is not so much a matter of good taste and of true esthetic effect, but baldly and coarsely a question of cost. Pile on the passementerie, stick on the diamonds wherever there is room for one, invent new things whose only charm is expensiveness, ransack Europe for what can not be found at home. Do not mind the cost. The husband may be lucky in futures, or something else of the sort. If he should fail, failures are fashionable—and sometimes profitable. If the father should show signs of worry because the outgo exceeds the income, it can not be helped—one must keep up with the neighbors. Put on the steam! it is a fast age, and it will not do to fall into the rear. Drive on. The crash may come, but let us have a good time first. We must keep up with the times.

Broken fortunes, debt, and bankruptcies are not the only and the worst fruits of this folly. There is something worse than squandering money. A noble woman is of more value than a colossal fortune.
